

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

600061094Q

HUGH RUSSELL AT HARROW.

A SKETCH OF SCHOOL LIFE.

BY

AN OLD HARROVIAN.

"Forty years on, when afar and asunder,
Parted are those who are singing to-day,
When you look back, and forgetfully wonder
What you were like in your work and your play,
Then, it may be, there will often come o'er you,
Glimpses of notes like the catch of a song,
Visions of boyhood shall float them before you,
Echoes of dreamland shall bear them along."

SCHOOL SONG.

London:

PROVOST AND CO.,

40, TAVISTOCK STREET, COVENT GARDEN.

1880.

251. c. 993.

TO ALL
OLD HARROVIANS

THIS LITTLE BOOK IS

HUMBLY

Dedicated,

NOT WITHOUT A HOPE THAT

IT MAY RECALL,

TO SOME AT LEAST, THE

BRIGHT DAYS

OF

AULD LANG SYNE.

pages of this book, and his readers are assured that by "Mr. Kingsford's," no house in particular is meant.

The glossary (for the use of any non-Harroviau readers who may look at this book) cannot lay claim to be by any means a complete vocabulary of Harrow slang; still the Author ventures to hope that it will fulfil its purpose.

The Author's thanks are due to an old Harrovian for several valuable suggestions, and other aids.

CONTENTS.

CHAP.		PAGE
I.	FIRST IMPRESSIONS	9
II.	HOUSE LIFE	16
III.	EASTER TERM	24
IV.	RUNNING EXPERIENCES... ..	30
V.	CONCERNING WORK	38
VI.	SUMMER TERM	43
VII.	COUSIN CHARLIE	51
VIII.	THE "EX"	61
IX.	COCK-HOUSE MATCH	68
X.	TRIALS	74

CHAP.	PAGE
XI. RATS	84
XII. DECORATIONS	90
XIII. ANOTHER SUMMER TERM	96
XIV. LORDS	103
XV. RUSSELL'S "FIND"	105
XVI. A "STOPPED EX"	116
XVII. SIXTH-FORM DIGNITY	124
XVIII. CONCLUSION	181

HUGH RUSSELL AT HARROW.

CHAPTER I.

FIRST IMPRESSIONS.

“My boy, th’ unwelcome hour is come,
When thou, transplanted from thy genial home,
Must find a colder soil and bleaker air,
And trust for safety to a stranger’s care.”

COWPER.

ON E September afternoon a fly might have been seen crawling up the hill from the Harrow station. Outside was a port-manteau, a hamper, and a large wooden box; inside, a hat-box, a large bag, an umbrella, and a small boy. The fly drew up before the front door of one of the masters’ houses. With some diffidence, the small boy, after extricating himself from his baggage, proffered the flyman three shillings, but was promptly informed by that worthy that six was always the fare. What was the good of arguing?

Besides, there stood the obsequious footman waiting to admit him, and it wouldn't do to look stingy now he was a Harrow fellow. So, giving the flyman what he demanded, though secretly determined to have it out with that same individual when he got the chance, our hero followed the footman through the entrance-hall, after seeing his luggage taken in at the boys' door. "Perhaps you'd like to see master first, sir?" said his conductor, ushering him into a cheerful study. "I'll tell him you've come." So saying, he closed the door, and left the new-comer to his own reflections.

Hugh Russell, for that was his name, was the only son of a well-known barrister, who had himself been at Harrow, and whose fond wish was that his son should go there too. So he had sent him, about two years before this narrative commences, to a private school of some reputation, most of whose pupils went to Harrow. Our hero therefore knew several now in the school, though, by a curious chance, none in the house which he was entering. He had passed his entrance examination at the end of the previous term.

As he stood in the study looking about him, I am afraid he was by no means the ideal "new boy" of the story-books. He was not overwhelmed with home sickness, starting at every sound, and gazing with misty eyes out of the window, wishing himself back in the train on his way home, or anywhere except where he was. No; he had been brought up to look forward to his Harrow days as pleasant ones, and now the eventful time had come, though it might seem a little strange and sudden, he had made up his mind to enjoy himself. In a few moments the door opened, and Mr. Kingsford, a kind-looking elderly man, advanced and shook hands, saying, "I remember your father well; he was in this house many years ago, when I was one of the junior masters, and an honour he was to it, in work and play alike." Then after a few inquiries about his parents, he moved towards the door, saying, "I'll introduce you to the matron, Miss Browne, and then you can find out your room, and so on, before the rush of fellows comes. They don't return till the evening generally—like to make the very most of their holidays, you know."

In a few moments our hero was sitting in a snug little room, discussing a cup of tea with a pleasant old lady. He did not know it then, but Miss Browne had quite a mania for offering tea to her guests, and was deeply offended if they would not take any, whether it was morning, noon, or night. "Now, my dear boy," she began, as if she had known him all her life, "I may as well take the opportunity to give you a few words of advice about several things which you will find it hard to resist in this place. They will ask you—nay, command you—to play at football, whether it is wet or fine, and whether you are well or not. My dear boy, never you play football except on nice fine, warm days, and always wear your thickest coat and comforter, both in going down and coming up. Then again, never be led into playing rackets; it is a dangerous game. Last term a boy in this house slipped and fell; and though he did not hurt himself outwardly, yet the shock to his nervous system was so great that he was unable to resume his studies for a week." Much more wholesome warning did the good old lady administer, and to hear her, few would have thought how keen she really was for the honour of the house, and how on the day of a "house-match" she would hurry down through the mud, and stay from beginning to end, hardly restraining herself from shouting when a base was gained.

"Your room is No. 10," she said, after her little lecture was ended; "it is a dormitory with five beds, but in a term or two you will get put into one of the regular rooms with the cupboard beds, and only one boy besides yourself, where you will be more comfortable. At present your sitting-room will be with Adams and Drake senior, in No. 7." So saying, she rang the bell, which was answered by a maid-servant who conducted Russell to No. 10, where we will leave him to unpack and secure for himself the snuggest of the five beds before any one else arrives.

Passing over the events of the following day, which for our hero were unimportant—a French examination taking place in the afternoon—let us imagine ourselves in No. 10 early the next morning. All except one, Burton by name, are new fellows, and they are all naturally, except him (for he has no chance of a remove), rather anxious to know their places in the school. Although none of the four (for number five has not turned up yet) had ever seen each other till the night before last, they seem very good friends. "Wonder when we've got to get up," said Russell, drowsily; then, raising his voice, "I say, Burton, what time did you say 'Speecher' was?" "O bother you," exclaimed that party, who was trying to doze, "can't you let a fellow take his 'froust' the very second morning? I believe it's at eight, at least it usually is." To hear him talk you would think Burton had been three or four years at Harrow, whereas really he was only one term old. Suddenly a bell begins, an impatient-sounding, restless bell, and at its sound Russell and the two other new fellows, Vernon and Leigh, jump out of bed, thinking they are late. "You'd better get up, Burton," says one of them, "bell is going!" (this from the depths of a basin of cold water). No answer. "I say, you fellow, you'll be late!" cries another, as he hurries on his clothes. "No fear," replies the veteran, "only first bell!" It is provoking, but as they are so far dressed, it is no good going to bed again, so after completing their toilet, they saunter downstairs, encountering numbers of sleepy fellows in their nightshirts rushing to the hot water tap with jugs.

By the time the three reach the school-yard a sprinkling of fellows is beginning to collect, while every few minutes a master sweeps up the street in cap and gown. In a few moments the sprinkling becomes a crowd, and the crowd a crush, as every one hurries up the steps into the old speech-room. Here the new fellows crowd into the space under the gallery, behind the masters, known as the "sheep-pen." A great hum of voices and trampling of feet fill the room, but as the clock strikes, a sudden silence takes place. Then, after prayers, the head master rises to read the new order for the term, beginning at the bottom of the school. How many hearts are beating! Fellows try to look indifferent, but it is a time of suspense for not a few. Russell listens, visibly anxious, as he hears the lists of the Third and Second Fourth forms read, then the Upper Fourth. "New boys in the Upper Fourth form," continues the head master, "Leigh, Vernon, ——" Ah! there are his companions, but still not Russell. At last it comes; he is in the Middle Shell. He cannot help turning to his neighbour to ask if he too has been read out; but one of the masters turns in his seat and frowns, so our hero is hushed into silence.

Soon after, he finds himself following his new master to his schoolroom, where a short time is spent in giving out the work for the term, and preparation for eleven o'clock school, after which the form disperses. Burton is in this form, and he at once pounces upon Russell for a promise to do his work with him.

After breakfast in the hall, Russell strolls up town to post a letter, and coming back he meets several of his old schoolfellows, who all seem to envy him the lofty position he has taken in the school.

Nothing remarkable took place that day, but next morning our hero met with a little adventure that is perhaps worth recording.

Hearing that he was in Mr. ——'s "Teek Div.," and that the exercise was such-and-such a number in "Colenso," he studiously worked out the sums overnight, and next morning repaired in his innocence to his form room. On entering the room, he found his form master surrounded by a lot of big fellows, so he beat a hasty retreat. He asked some one who was standing outside where he ought to go to, but this fellow happened to be a wag, so he sent him to a room under the "Vaughan," where he disturbed a form that was just beginning work. Altogether it was late before, with the help of "Noggs," he found his way into a dingy attic, at the very top of the old schools. Everybody turned at his entrance, and the master stopped writing on the black-board to ask his name and what made him so late. "Speak to me afterwards," he said, as our hero began to stammer out an explanation. The "speaking" consisted in a "pun" of fifty lines, for absenting himself from "Fourth-form prayers," an institution the existence of which he was altogether ignorant.

However, after a few such little mistakes and troubles, Russell shook down into his new life, and before a week had passed, found himself rarely at a loss as to what he ought to do, and where he ought to go to. Altogether, as he wrote in a letter home, he liked Harrow very much, and got to know some very nice fellows, and he was sure he should be very happy.

stock of patent fire-lighters from the "Harrow Stores," but both these systems proved expensive, and did not answer as well as he expected, since the menial was in the employ of others besides himself, and the fire-lighters, which he secreted under his bed, were usually bagged in his absence by unscrupulous fellows, who appreciated a good fire. Still there was not that amount of hardship and physical pain to be endured which outsiders usually associate with the mention of fagging at a public school; and if a racket did occasionally appear on the scene, what a hero and a martyr did the negligent fag appear among his equals.

Of course, during his first term, Russell was of no great importance, except in his own little circle of acquaintance, chiefly consisting of those who had come with him into the school; and in those good old days no new fellow ever thought of whistling about the passages, or skylarking at the house-door, or if he did, he was soon taught his position. With very few exceptions, the only big fellows he knew to speak to were Adams and Drake senior, in whose room he sat, or rather stood, for it was one of those untidy sort of rooms where a chair is never to be found, being either broken or borrowed, so that our hero did most of his work either standing, kneeling, or sitting on the edge of the coal-scuttle.

The occupants of No. 7 rejoiced in the possession of an electric machine, with which they delighted to administer shocks to the uninitiated. Of course Russell was usually the subject of their experiments, which he underwent with exemplary submission and good-nature. One night, Adams and Drake applied the machine to their door handle, in the expectation of surprising the servant who came to see the lights out: by and by steps were heard down the passage; the handle was turned—a pause—a struggle—a cry as of some one in pain. The conspirators with difficulty restrained their laughter. The plan had succeeded beyond expectation. In a minute or two the compassionate Drake said, “Come now, the poor fellow has had enough of it; let him go!” So they “broke the connection,” as they called it, and awaited the entrance of the irate servant. The door opened and in walked—the House-master, not a little nettled at the joke which had been played on him! He threatened to forfeit the machine. Drake and Adams pleaded their love of scientific research, but he didn’t seem to see it, and, repeating his threat, left the room, after giving the science-loving pair a Georgic apiece. The machine was eventually taken from them, being the result of an experiment on a small terrier belonging to the “private side.”

After this misfortune the philosophers invested in an air-pistol, with which they practised target-shooting at the door panel, to the danger of anybody coming suddenly into the room; but one day one of the darts narrowly missing the eye of one of the maids, she made a complaint, which resulted in the abstraction of the weapon.

Adams was in the Third Fifth, and Drake in the Upper Remove, though, by reason of his stature, he wore “tails,”—“Charity tails,” as Adams called them; but Drake was highly offended if he heard such a thing said. “Can’t you fellows understand,” he would say, “that ‘Charity-tails’ are only when fellows below the Removes stick on tails; in the Removes they are ‘Voluntary-tails,’ put on at the will of the wearer; nobody can stop his having them." To this doctrine Drake stuck, and never lost an opportunity of impressing it on his friends. In consequence of this he obtained the nickname of "Tails," which clung to him ever after.

One Saturday evening Russell came into No. 7 with a pensive air, and stopped before his book-shelf for about five minutes before he took down an atlas, and, placing it on the table, drew up the coal-scuttle and settled himself to turn over its leaves. By and by he began rather timidly, "Oh, Adams, are you very busy?" "No," replied Adams, who was concocting a brew over the fire, "what is the row?" "Well, I've got a beastly map to do, and I've never done one before, and I don't know how to set about it." "Oh, I'll soon show you," replied Adams, jumping up, and upsetting the brew into the fire in his haste; "have you got any cardboard?" "No." "Well then, go and borrow a bit." In a few minutes Russell returned with the required article. "Now then," said Adams, "what map is it?" "India." "All right, capital; you ought to trace it by rights, but this will do as well." So saying, he dashed off an outline (in the shape of a V slightly rounded at the bottom), drew a wavy line or two for the chief rivers, and then said, "Fill my tooth-glass with water, while I go and bag somebody's paints!" In a few minutes he returned with a paint-box and a brush, and proceeded to render the map gaudy, if not artistic. "Now then, the rest you can do yourself. Just run a pen over the rivers I have marked in pencil, then put in half a dozen big towns from the atlas, and fill up any blank or bare-looking places, with small rivers, lakes, mountains, and towns."

With this parting advice, and the request to "keep the fire going, I shan't be back till prayers," he went off to spend the evening in a room downstairs, where on Saturday nights the members of a "Biscuit and Cocoa Club" were wont to congregate.

Russell went on quietly with his map. In a few minutes Drake came in and settled himself in a "frouster" which he had bagged from the next room. "Map?" he asked laconically. "Yes," replied Russell. Then a silence, only interrupted by the scratching of the pen on the map, and the occasional dropping of a coal from the fire. At last; "I say; this part of the map looks so bare, what shall I do?" "Oh, stick in towns!" "But there aren't any in the atlas within miles." "Well, never mind, I'll tell you some. India is it? Very well, fire away! Botherabad, Humbugee, Punchistan, Walloppore, Fiddleabad—any more?" "No, thanks, that'll do. Now about these mountains; I don't know how to draw them." "Oh, I'll try and help you," said Drake, getting up and seizing the pen. "Look here, like a caterpillar, so, you know, or else——" "Oh, I say," interrupted the learner, "you've put a range right across where the mouths of the Ganges come!" "Oh, have I? what's the odds? you can cut through, or go round the other side, or don't bother about the Ganges at all; but, as I was saying, there's another way—in fact, several—of doing mountains. Besides the caterpillar-pattern there's the zigzag; just backwards and forwards like this" (drawing a chain of mountains promiscuously in the sea), "and then there's the coal dodge, very effective, see; it ought really to be done with a stump, but this does quite as well," and so saying, he seized a bit of coal, moistened it, and proceeded to make a grimy line with his little finger, having first rubbed it on the coal. Russell was much obliged, but declined to learn any more ways of doing mountains—three separate styles on one map (including a range in the sea, to contain which he had to draw an imaginary island) were quite enough, so at least thought the master to whom the production was shown up.

“House-singing” was not very delightful to Russell in these younger days, as his voice was not melodious, which was a very good reason why he should always be “put on” for a solo, which amused others more than himself. He didn’t mind it so much when it was in the house, but when they joined other houses down in the music-room (as they did then every other week), the publicity became rather trying. Besides this, he had (as a new fellow) to attend compulsory singing on half-holiday afternoons, so altogether for him music had but few charms. With regard to this compulsory class-singing we may notice a little incident not altogether pleasant.

The first whole holiday that our hero spent at Harrow, he “cut” singing in the afternoon. Next day his name was read out at first school to go to the head master at nine o’clock. He couldn’t imagine why he had been “sent up,” and of course everybody grinned and went through an absurd pantomime strongly suggestive of corporal punishment. At nine o’clock he made his way to the head master’s room for the dreaded interview. When he was charged with absenting himself from singing, his indignation was very great. His line of argument was—singing is looked on as a lesson; a holiday is a day when no lessons are done; therefore there is no singing on a whole holiday. But the head master failed to see it in the same light, and dismissed him with a hundred Greek lines.

From the very first, our hero had gone in for "footer" with a will. He refused to take advantage of the respite customary to new fellows, and every house-game saw him down. At "compul." he was very regular too, and he was a most enthusiastic spectator at house matches.

In the latter his house had been singularly fortunate, and succumbed only in "cock-house match," on which occasion Russell spent all his "allows," and the remainder of his pocket-money, on lemons, for the gallant players of his house, and was hoarse for days after from shouting.

Another pastime in which he indulged a good deal was "squash-rackets." There was a very good "squash-court" attached to the house, and whenever he could get a "place," Russell was to be seen there.

And so, it will be seen, our hero's first time was by no means unhappy, and when the Christmas holidays began, he drove down to the station with a half-feeling of reluctance to part from his friends, even for a few weeks, so pleasantly had the time passed.

CHAPTER III.

EASTER TERM.

"It was not many days beyond the Feast of Valentine,
When to be a gallant Torpid I fervently did pine."

FROM "THE HARROVIAN."

"GOT your remove?" said Hawkins, the head of Russell's house, touching our hero on the shoulder. "Yes; just scraped through, only one below me." It was the second morning of the Easter term, after "Speecher," and Russell happened to be in the hot-meat room at Winkley's when Hawkins came in. It was a cold morning, and the place was crowded. "Six of sausages, without!" gently suggested the modest Fourth-form boy. "Now then, look sharp, three bob of steak and cutlets!" roared the impatient representative of a hungry "find." "I've been here this last hour!" cried some one who had just stepped in—"a bob of fish-cutlets with!" "Oh, I say, it's no good waiting, come round to the eggs-and-bacon place," said another to his companion. It seemed as if Russell would never get the meat for his "find."

At last he got it, and started off at a run along the street. As he neared the house, he heard "Bo-o-o-o-o-oy," and recognised Brydges' call. He hurried upstairs, and found the "find" in a great state of impatience. "Why was he so late? Had he been able to get salmon? Had he brought rolls?" As soon as he had answered these questions satisfactorily, and made the tea, he hurried down to hall, to partake of his own meal, but had hardly sat down before he heard another call from Brydges. What had he forgotten? he wondered. Salt? No. Mustard? No. There was nothing for it but to go; so he left his "six of sausages" untouched, and ran upstairs. "What is it?" he breathlessly inquired, putting his head in at the door. "Come in," said Brydges solemnly. (No hope of his getting down before the breakfast in the hall was cleared.) "I have put down your name," continued Brydges, "for the Rifle Corps, and I am going to tell you what you are expected to do." So saying, he proceeded to describe the various drills, practices, &c., which were necessary to be attended. This was all very well, and no doubt it was a great honour to be thus familiarly instructed by the captain of the corps; still, to be enlisted without his knowledge, was too much of a good thing. However, resistance was useless; the considerate captain had ordered the tailor to come and measure Russell and several others for their uniforms, and had had their names duly entered. So Private Russell resolved to make the best of it, and before long was very proud of his military position; and he was most industrious in persuading his friends to join the corps.

Before long "Torpids" began, and Russell played for his house. In their first tie they were easily successful, but in the next draw they were confronted with a very good team, and played a game worth recording.

Great was the excitement among the players on the eventful day. Russell played "half-back," which was not his usual place, a change having been caused by one of the "torpids" having got hurt in the last match. He was therefore, naturally, not a little nervous. For the first quarter of an hour the ball was kept well down by the enemy's base, but at last Irving (the captain of the other side, and a "fez") got hold of it, and began a smart "run-up." On he came like the wind, keeping the ball close in front of him, dodging first one and then another. He was a big heavy fellow, and Russell didn't like the looks of him. However, he saw that he must tackle him, and accordingly prepared to charge him. Of course it was like running against a house, but still it checked his progress; and before he had recovered himself, Russell had picked himself up, and was taking the ball down the side. Irving was soon up with him, and "skied" him, but not before our hero had sent the ball flying right down to the other end, where, after a little knocking about, it soon found its way between the poles. It was the only base gained that day, and the victory was considered as in a great measure due to Russell's plucky play. In the next tie he played "forward," and had the satisfaction of getting a base himself.

It will be remembered that he had secured his remove, but the increase of work was not burdensome. However, somehow he was not so high in week's order as he wished, and this term he found his way into the realms of "extra." Not that he became a regular denizen of the room over Old Speecher, one of those phlegmatic mortals who turn up there every time as regular as clock-work, and who know exactly what master is taking "extra," and whether it is safe to eat apples or chocolate under his nose. Russell went to "extra," but only twice that term, and he failed to form the attachment to that institution which some regular goers profess.

Time passed quickly, and the races were soon on. New fellows, as a rule, do not go out running much, nor was Russell an exception. However, he started in all the house races, getting second in the "small hundred;" and managing to pull off the half-mile, owing in some measure to his good handicap.

His house did not have house sports, an institution now kept up by only one or two houses; but they had a house steeple-chase, in which everybody, big and small, started; all, except a few of the older fellows, going head first into the water-jump, which the late rains had swelled. In this race our hero had the misfortune to hurt his ankle, which laid him up in "sicker" for a little time. However, he didn't mind, as he saw plenty of company, and had no work to do.

One evening, as he was lying reading a book, during Fourth school-time, he heard somebody coming upstairs, and in a moment Burton entered the room. "Hullo!" said Russell, "I thought you were up in school." "So I ought to be," he replied, "but I've only just got out of 'pupe.'" "What? why it's half an hour since Fourth school began!" "Yes, I know, but I left my hat in 'pupe,' and ran back to fetch it, and while I was there, the 'old man' (Mr. Kingsford) came to lock the door, which he had forgotten to do; I sung out, but he didn't hear, and so I've been bottled up there ever since." "How did you get out?" "Oh, Hopper came in to see about the fire" (Hopper was one of the footmen), "and after being nearly frightened out of his life on seeing me, he released me. As it is, I've 'cut' school, so I may as well set to and do some of my poetry for to-night. Help me, there's a good fellow." So saying, he got out a pen, and, after finding a piece of paper, said: "Now; English verses on Magna Charta; come, give us an idea." "Well," said Russell, after pondering a few minutes, "couldn't you begin something like this:—

"O glorious Magna Charta,
The noble and the——"

"No, that won't do; try something else, something about King John." After some deliberation they produced between them the following spirited lines, with which I will conclude this chapter.

THE MAGNA CHARTA.

King John did sit upon his throne
In famous London town,
When nobles did a glorious deed
For signature bear down.
The king he sat, and held his pen,
And smiled so bland around;
And smiled again, and called for ink,
And made a pleasing sound:
A sound of laughter and of mirth,
Whereat all did applaud,
For all rejoiced to see this smile
Come from their sovereign lord.

The king, he graciously did sign
The paper that he saw,
And vowed that, for all time to come,
It should be British law.
The people cheered, and cheered again ;
The king, he laughed for glee,
For he was always well content
His people glad to see.
And now, when years have passed away,
There still lives in our minds
The Magna Charta, with its laws
Of many different kinds.
And we still boast of liberty
Which it has brought about ;
So many privileges great,
We could not do without.
And still in feast and revel,
With shouting and with wine,
We sing of the great Charta,
Which good King John did sign.

(I was never myself at a dinner-party where they sang songs about the Magna Charta, but still—to conclude) :

And still we tell our children
The story handed down,
How this great deed was signed of yore,
In famous London town.

Worthy of Macaulay, that last bit ; nevertheless I had some idea that the Magna Charta was not signed in the metropolis, but I suppose I must have been mistaken.

CHAPTER IV.

RUNNING EXPERIENCES.

“Ho ho! ha ha! Tra la la la!
So sound the fairy voices.
From all the lowland western lea,
The Uxbridge flats and meadows,
From where the Ruislip waters see
The Oxhey lights and shadows;
From Wembley rise and Kenton stream,
From Preston farm and hollow,
Where Lyon * dreamed, and saw in dream
His race of sons to follow;
They tell of rambles near and far,
By hedge, and brook, and border.”

SCHOOL SONG.

I MUST ask my readers to suppose a year to have elapsed since the events recorded in the last chapter. It is again Easter term; “torpids” are over, and running is in full force. Our hero is now an individual of some importance, having got his “fez,” and being in the Upper Remove. He is in a room with a fellow called Lyon, who is in the Upper Shell—a pleasant companion when you once know him, but always very quiet, and certainly not a brilliant conversationist. At work he is not very bright, but he is a good cricketer, and fair player at football. His great strength lies in running, and of nothing is he fonder than a good trot over the country on a half-holiday afternoon; not one of your little runs a mile down the Pinner road and back, or over to Kenton, but a regular steady grind over to Elstree or Ealing. Not that he is above an afternoon at Kenton Brook now and then, but that is not his idea of a run. Naturally Russell is most frequently his companion. Lyon never runs out with more than two others. Those big parties usually do more humbugging than running. When he can get no one to come with him, he starts off alone; but most often he is with Russell, who has fallen into his paces, and the two are a very good pair. One or two of their runs may prove interesting to the reader.

* John Lyon, the founder of Harrow School, lived at a hamlet called Preston, a few miles from Harrow.

It was a cold dull day in the beginning of March, when Russell and Lyon sauntered up town after breakfast. They strolled up to the school gates to read the notices. One was to the effect that Mr. — and Mr. — (farmers over Kenton way) had consented to fellows running over their ground so long as they did not smash the fences. It was all very well, but how was anybody to know which was Farmer Brown's, and which was Farmer Smith's? So remarked Lyon on reading the notice. "Oh, it's no odds," replied Russell, "if we do get on somebody's land who hasn't given his consent, we can but say we didn't know."

That afternoon, after two bill, they started off together over the Footer-field, past the back of Ducker, and away across the fields to the railway, then over the level-crossing, and across more fields to "the Brook"—a run known to most Harrovians. The floods had been out, and the water was unjumpable, so they waded across by a dam, more than knee deep, and proceeded up the hill which overlooks the Kingsbury race-course. Then away over more fields, until at last they lost their bearings, and began to wonder how they should find their way back again. "What's the time?" asked Lyon of Russell, who carried the watch. "Twenty to four," he replied. "Oh, we'll never be back to four bill; let's cut it, and go a long run." Accordingly they ran on, until at last they came out on a road which landed them at Hendon. Here they got some slight refreshment, and prepared to return by the road. However, when they reached Kingsbury, they thought they would try a short cut home over the race-course, and accordingly started in that direction. Before they had gone very far they heard a shout, and looking behind, saw a man a few fields off, signalling to them. It was too late to stop and explain, besides, he appeared savage, so they increased their pace—the man after them; they expecting that he would soon give in. Not a bit of it; the rustic seemed determined to nail them. On they went, hiding their caps to prevent his seeing what house they belonged to. At last they gained the railroad, and resolved to skulk down behind the hedge along the line, hoping their pursuer would cross it and get on the wrong scent. So he did; but they had not got far before a new difficulty presented itself in the shape of three irate navvies, who wanted to know why they were trespassing on the line. In a few minutes they, too, were in full chase, nor did they give in till Russell and Lyon were a good way down the Kenton road. No sooner were they rid of these pursuers, however, than they saw coming towards them, evidently disgusted at his failure, returning by the road, their former enemy, the rustic ; who, on seeing them, at once attempted to cut off their retreat. However, by a long roundabout way over the fields in the direction of the station, they eluded him, but he was not slow to follow them up the hill. Lock-up bell was ringing as they went through the town, and everybody stared to see two fellows at such a time in running-clothes. They had to go in to answer their names at "lock-up" without changing, but, thanks to long Ulsters, their garb was not detected ; and they afterwards had the satisfaction of seeing their baffled pursuer, from their window, telling his story to a group of "chaws," who seemed vastly diverted at his expense.

A week or two after this adventure, Lyon got himself, Russell, and Burton "signed" for dinner and two bill. It was a whole holiday, and they had resolved to run over to Uxbridge, where Lyon had some friends, lunch there, and return in time for four bill. Most fellows who heard of the plan were incredulous—said it could not be done in the time, and so on.

However, nothing daunted, they started off immediately after eleven bill (having in fact previously changed, and slipped on great coats and trousers over their running clothes, for bill), and were soon in full swing. They were not very clear about the way, and the road they took was perhaps not the shortest. After passing the top of the cricket-field, they kept along the Northolt road, till they came to the turn on the right which leads into the straight stretch known as the "Uxbridge Mile." Having walked over the little piece of connecting road, they were able to do the mile at racing speed, Lyon being first by a little, and Russell second, Burton having given up a little more than half way. The two others rather regretted having asked Burton to join them, as he seemed likely to be somewhat a drag. However, on the whole, he kept up pretty well till they reached Ickenham, where he seemed very grateful for a lift in a countryman's cart, which was going into Uxbridge. The others kept up with the cart most of the way. The party reached their destination at a quarter to one, and after washing off the dust of their journey, appeared at lunch. They must have looked strange sitting down in such a garb with ladies, in a civilised room; but nothing else could be expected, and their entertainers seemed rather to enjoy the novelty than otherwise. Lyon was very abstemious, for fear of not being able to run afterwards; but the unwary Burton was beguiled into making rather a hearty meal, and did not refuse cake, the result of which imprudence was that he was not in the best form on the return journey. Not so very far from home, somewhere in the region of the Rifle Butts, he complained that he was dead beat; the others said they would walk the rest of the way with him, but he would not hear of it; and as Lyon was especially anxious to convince certain unbelievers by turning up at four bill, they yielded to Burton's wishes without much pressing, he saying that he would follow quietly. As they reached the foot of the hill the bell was ringing, but they managed to be just in time for bill, and afterwards returned to the house to enjoy a bath after their exertions. This done, and some time having been spent over the fire, telling their adventures to a few idlers who came into the room, lock-up bell began to ring, and (the next day being Sunday) they hastened out to lay in provisions.

About seven o'clock, as Russell and Lyon were sitting over their exercises, in came "Jimmy" Bel-field. "I say, didn't Burton start with you fellows out running to-day?" he asked. "Yes," replied Russell, "but he got rather pumped, so we left him on the way home to follow at his leisure. Why do you ask?" "Because the old man is in his study wanting to know why he didn't come to lock-up." "Didn't he?" said Russell in surprise; "why, I made sure he'd turn up all right; but I'll go and have a jaw with the old man about it." So saying, he left the room, and was soon in the study telling all he knew of the matter to Mr. Kingsford. "Where did you leave him?" asked the master. "On the road, just near the Butts," replied Russell. "Well, something must have happened; he is a steady sort of fellow; not likely to absent himself like this on purpose. Perhaps he has sprained his ankle, or got into a bog, or something." So saying, he rang the bell, ordered his carriage, and telling Russell to get ready to accompany him, went to prepare a lantern and get on his hat and coat.

Before very long the carriage was on its way along the road, the coachman keeping a sharp look-out on the sides of the road illuminated by the carriage lamps. When they got near to the spot where Russell said they had left Burton, they alighted, and with the aid of a big lantern investigated every likely place, expecting every moment to come upon a huddled mass of humanity, or to hear a moan proceeding from the ditch. No; nothing met the eye or ear. A cottage was near at hand, but all inquiries there were fruitless; nothing had been heard or seen of the missing Burton.

After a long search they returned, giving up all hope of making any discovery till the morning. It was nearly ten o'clock by the time they pulled up before the house. The door was opened by Crabbe, the butler, who said, "Mr. Burton's all right home, sir; he came back not very long after you left."

Burton was soon in the study, giving an account of his misfortunes to Mr. Kingsford and Russell. He had told his story already to most of the fellows in the house, who naturally had been in some excitement before his return.

"After you left me," he began, turning to Russell, "I went on all right, at a walk, for some little way. However, before very long, a blister on my heel, which I had felt slightly for some time, became so much worse that I could hardly get along. At last I had to sit down by the roadside to rest. Then I went on for a bit, but soon I had to stop again, and so on; so that it was pretty dark by the time I got on to the Northolt road. Just then there came by a great lumbering covered cart, which I hailed, and asked the fellow who was driving if he could give me a lift to Harrow. He said, 'Yes;' but added that there was no place where I could sit comfortably except on some sacks in the back part of the cart. There it was quite dark, so that I could not see whereabouts we were. However, I was well content to get a place to rest myself; and in spite of the jolting of the cart, I managed by some ill luck to fall asleep; I suppose I was rather tired. The next thing I remember is being woke up by a gruff voice saying, close to me, 'Hullo, master! bless'd if I didn't forget all about you!' I started up, and saw it was the driver speaking. 'Where are we?' I asked. 'Why, down at 'Arrer station,' he replied. I must have slept long and soundly, for it seems that he went up the hill, and stopped at the 'Crown and Anchor' to get a drink (which probably in part accounted for his forgetting me); then he called at a shop where he had to leave a parcel, and then drove on down past 'The Grove' to the station. I got out, rubbing my eyes, and began to wonder how to get home. Walking was out of the question, as my foot was very painful. I managed, however, to get a fly (by the way, the man charged seven shillings and sixpence), and here I am safe at last."

This was the last time Burton tried a long run. "You see, it's not in my line," he would say.

That year Russell's house had a "mile," the cup being given by an old Harrovian. Owing to his success in the "half-mile" the year before, our hero's handicap was not very liberal; but, nevertheless, he would have managed to get a place at least, had not a vexatious accident occurred. Just as he turned the corner, and was beginning his "spurt," out rushed a big dog from among the bystanders, barking and careering about the road. By some evil chance he managed to get in front of the runner's legs, and down came Russell, cutting his hands badly and grazing his knee. This spoilt a very good race, as he, with Belfield and Lyon, were running neck and neck. As it was, the two others made a "dead heat" of it.

CHAPTER V.

CONCERNING WORK.

"Jack's a scholar, as all men say,
Dreams in Latin and Greek,
Gobbles a grammar in half a day,
And a lexicon once a week.
Three examiners came to Jack,
'Tell us all you know ;'
But when he began, 'To Oxford back,'
'They murmured, 'we will go!'"

SCHOOL SONG.

AFTER the preceding chapter on athletics, it may be well, for a change, to turn to graver matters. Our hero, though he kept his place in form with no great difficulty, was never the ideal "master's boy," who goes into raptures over a Greek chorus, writes home to his people in Latin, and spends his half-holidays in reading Herodotus for his own amusement, or writing "Jambics" for the week after next.

Russell was of opinion that school-work was a necessity, very often an unpleasant one, but still a necessity that must be put up with. He didn't mind Homer and Virgil, but (nor was he singular in this respect) he could never be brought to see the beauty of such characters as Ulysses and Æneas, who always burst into tears on the very slightest provocation, and who, when asked who they are, reply, in a loud voice, "I am Ulysses (or Æneas, as the case may be, for one character seems cribbed from the other), renowned throughout the whole world, whose fame reaches the heavens!" or in modest words to that effect.

As to a Greek chorus, Russell hated the sight of one; so that when an enthusiastic master would read out some passage with pathos or fervour, and exclaim, "Oh, it is bee-yewtiful, bee-yewtiful, isn't it?" the unclassical Russell would smile, and make a remark to his neighbour which I shall not repeat.

Then again he failed to see any loveliness in a "prop." of Euclid, or a long sum in decimals, and he wondered why every "prop." could not be taken for granted, like the postulates, and what possessed the idiot who ordained that

$5\frac{1}{2}$ yds. = 1 pole

$2\frac{1}{4}$ inches = 1 nail to introduce the fractions, unless it were to complicate sums and make fellows lose their temper.

Modern languages he saw more fun in. As to the exercises in French, he usually stuck anything down that came into his head, and then said, "Oh, of course!" in a tone of vexation, as each mistake was pointed out. As to the translations from French into English, I am afraid they were rather literal, and showed but few traces of the dictionary's use whenever a "shot" at the meaning of a word would do instead. As, for instance:—

"Mr. Crow, over a tree perched, held in his beak a cheese. Mr. Reynard by the odour disgusted, to him a tint to a little near this language: 'Hi! good day, Mr. of the crow! That you are jolly, that you resemble a fine (man). Without mentioning it, if your rummage reports itself to your plumage, you are the phoenix of these hostile woods.'

I refrain from copying more from Russell's exercise, but the above will show the talent and labour expended on this part of his work.

Essays he revelled in, "because," as he would say, "you can write such glorious bosh!" To fill sixty or a hundred and twenty lines of exercise paper was his chief ambition, and that done, what remained on a Saturday night but to take his pleasure? This last usually consisted in roasting chestnuts in a neighbour's room, or, better still, in getting up a concert of combs, or a game of "high-cockalorum" in the passages.

Co-operation, and assistance from the Cyclopædia were freely resorted to in the production of essays. As, for example, on the subject of "Astronomy;" the Cyclopædia would be bagged from the house-library early in the evening, and, at seven or eight o'clock the essayists in the same form would appear in the room of one of their number. Biscuits would be produced, and the one who had the Cyclopædia would read out, "Astronomy is the science which treats of the heavenly bodies, their motions, positions, and changes," and then add, "that'll do for ten lines at least." Accordingly a busy scratching of pens for a few minutes, each one spreading out the idea into as many words as possible, something in this style: "Astronomy may be defined as a science rather than as an art, and treats, for the most part, of the stars which are distributed in such countless numbers over the surface of the great canopy of sky which covers the earth on which we live. Astronomy teaches us much concerning the movements of these heavenly bodies, and also of the varied and wonderful positions which Nature has destined them to occupy ; moreover, it is by the science of astronomy that we learn the changes to which these heavenly bodies are subject." Then another piece would be read and similarly expanded, and so on, till the article in the Cyclopædia became too deep for the ordinary mind. Then recourse would be had to invention. "Oh, say something about a fellow with a telescope!" suggests somebody. Whereupon, down goes the idea, in this form, perhaps : "And so it is that many a pleasant and instructive hour may be spent with a telescope. By applying the eye to one end of a tube, the wonders of the stars are revealed to the man with the telescope. This is indeed a wonderful thought, and one which ere now has caused master-minds to stagger. To reflect that by means of the telescope may be seen " (here the writer seems to be at a loss for particulars, as he goes on to say) "many wonderful things which could not be seen with the naked eye—this is a thought that few can thoroughly regard with calmness." By this time the necessary number of lines would be nearly filled up, and the essayist would abruptly conclude with the following brief but masterly peroration. "Astronomy, then, is the science of the stars, and it is a very wonderful science, and deserves encouragement. Long may it prosper! (This last was encouraging, at least to the philosopher.)

Latin prose bothered Russell terribly, and his

anger knew no bounds when one day, after finding a piece in Cicero, and copying it out verbatim, he had it returned full of corrections, and with the remark that the style was "canine." Then again, masters had such different ideas on the subject. His form master would tell him always to put the infinitive after "negari non potest," whereas such a proceeding in his pupil-room prose would bring down the displeasure of his tutor, who declared that quoniam followed by subjunctive was the correct thing. One day his tutor said that it was convenient in many cases to Latinise an English name; to put, for instance, "Promontorium Septentrionale" for "North Foreland," and even occasionally "Faber" for "Mr. Smith." However, when our hero next week dubbed Francis Bacon "Lardum," his tutor didn't seem to see it, which sadly puzzled poor Russell.

Then the "reps" were a source of trouble. Not that he was positively unable to remember them, but it cost him more trouble to do so than he usually cared to expend. There are some fellows who can read an ode of Horace through once or twice and know it. There are others who cannot remember two consecutive lines. "Odi profanum vulgus et arceo," begins one of these unfortunates, then stops dead. "Favete linguis," says the master, adding "Why don't you think of the English?" Accordingly he does; "I, a priest of the Muses" he knows it goes on, so he continues, "Ego sacerdos musarum." "Does that scan?" asks the exasperated master. Of course it does not, only he went by the English. And so he "skews" his "rep" daily; goes after dinner to the master's house; spends an hour, or often two, saying it line by line; gets "puns" for every mistake (as it is all counted for obstinacy); and has to write out the English of every "rep" through the term. Oh, and then the trial "rep!" If it is old work, it is just like new to him; he blunders, gets "skewed;" sent to "extra;" and goes home for his holidays hours after every one else has left, except a few martyrs like himself. If masters would only reflect, they would surely cease to imagine that any one would be such a fool as to go through all these tortures out of sheer obstinacy.

Russell was not one of these hopeless cases, but he "skewed" pretty often, and was frequently to be seen in his form-master's study in the early part of the afternoon. However, a quarter of an hour usually saw him free.

Sometimes, after four bill, he would saunter into the "Vaughan," to which he had a ticket, which he rather regretted having paid for, as it was never once demanded. He would peep into one book and another, chiefly the illustrated editions of Scott's novels and the poets. Then he delighted, for a change, to lug out some huge volume, atlas or Cyclopædia, and lay it on the superannuated chapel-lectern, where he would stand to peruse it; this had an air of importance, he thought. A great book, with horrible coloured plates of the tortures of the Inquisition, often occupied the lectern when he was there. Occasionally, he would look over the bound numbers of the "Harrovian," or the old "House-lists." Once he got hold of the "Evidence before the Commission on Public Schools," in the Harrow section of which he saw it stated that "first school" lasted only an hour, whereat he raved all the evening.

Altogether, he found a good deal to occupy his attention in the "Vaughan," and came to the conclusion that it wasn't half a bad place to go to when time hung heavy. The chairs were comfortable, and the soft seat round the bay window was delightful. Besides, there were lots of things to see—the racquet cup; the Ashburton shield (it was there then); the old silver arrow and shooting costume; the Wilkinson collection of antiquities and coins; the Indian curiosities; the portraits of celebrities; and no end of things besides; without mentioning the books.

At work altogether, as a rule, he was not lazy; that is, not lazier than many; and, as I have said before, he managed to keep a respectable place in form, and usually succeeded in obtaining a very fair report, whereby his people were kept satisfied, for they never expected him to turn out a genius; and his father was well pleased to see that he did not take to work to the exclusion of play, a proceeding he had a horror of, having visions of brain-fever and the south of France, as the results of a book-worm's mode of life.

CHAPTER VI.

SUMMER TERM.

“ If in the cricket-field sullen you’ve sat,
Doubting the value of ball and of bat,
Stray for a moment beneath the elm trees,
Nodding their heads to the tune of the breeze ;
Then, if you listen, their song you will hear
Rising in harmony measured and clear :
‘ This be your motto, ye sons of the hill,
Play with a purpose, and work with a will.’ ”

SONG OF THE HARROW CRICKET-FIELD ELM TREES.

IT was Russell’s second summer at Harrow. The last he had enjoyed after the fashion of small fellows—he had revelled in the ices of Winkley, and the justly-famed lemonade of Hance ; he had paddled and splashed in the shallow end of “ Ducker ;” he had lain on the grass in the cricket-field on match days, consuming cherries by the hundred ; he had made his debut at house games and in the school-yard ; he had eaten voraciously on “ Speecher ;” he had shouted at Lord’s till he was hoarse, and had trodden on the toes of an irate old gentlemen (an old Etonian) in his excitement ; he had, in short, done all that was right, and proper, and pleasant, for a fellow spending his first summer term at Harrow.

But this term he enjoyed himself even more than last year; he knew more fellows, felt himself of more importance, swam better, played cricket better, did most things better, and felt more at home.

So, it may be imagined, he was supremely happy. What more delightful than a whole holiday. The delicious "froust;" nine bill; breakfast (perhaps up at Winkley's—a luxurious and protracted meal); eleven bill; "Ducker;" dinner; two bill; then the whole afternoon down in the cricket-field, either playing or watching the match; then six bill; and then the cool evening to stroll up town, and sip iced lemonade—was not all this the height of bliss?

Then Sundays in the summer term; the stroll down to the fields before second chapel; the lying there in the new-mown hay, under the shade of the trees, when it was too sultry to go far; the walk after evening chapel down the London Road, where one seems to meet the whole school—these sunny memories are sweet to many an old Harrovian, strange as it may seem.

Russell was at this time a great enthusiast at the "Gym." At first he had not liked it much, that is, the regular routine, and was generally to be heard answering his name from some remote beam in the roof, where he would remain eating chocolate or some other delicacy, till he was chased from his position. However, he soon got to like the exercises, especially the horizontal bar, round which he spun in a most alarming manner, hanging by his eyelids, it seemed.

At "Ducker," too, he was singularly active; always going off the running board, or the top place, or the spring-board, or the bridge, or the top of a shed; never in the same place two moments together, always turning up where least expected. He had a supreme contempt for the type of fellow who goes down, languidly undresses, puts his finger in to see if the water is cold, and then, after a long period of irresolute shivering, crawls feet foremost down the steps, splashes, gets out again, and then, swathed in towels from head to foot, basks in the sun for half an hour, never attempting to go in a second time. Russell's plan of action was very different; he delighted in egg-diving, and swimming under water, and all sorts of feats. He had a great dislike to the practice of "ducking," and was only once known to resort to it, namely, one day when he saw a great bully of a fellow swim down, ducking every small beginner he came to, whereupon our hero deliberately swam up to him, laid hold of him by the shoulders and dived, detaining him at the bottom, till such time as the bully was on the point of drowning, when he released him, and went on his way as if nothing had happened. Russell would probably have won some swimming prizes that year, had he not been taken ill before the end of the term.

Being free from cricket fagging, he had more time to himself than the year before. At cricket he began to distinguish himself, and was a leading member of the "shell game." But his cricketing renown was nipped in the bud that year. One day he found himself in "Sicker," not feeling very well, and the next in the "Sanny," with the scarlatina. He was, unfortunately, the only patient there, and so was not so merry as he might have been, had there happened to be any companions in trouble. However, he managed to amuse himself—perused more novels than he ever had before; worked himself a pair of slippers; imbibed much lemonade, and altogether was not overwhelmed with his misfortune. Still, it was hard to be in bed when he knew that there was some match going on in the cricket-field, or that the festivities of “Speecher” were at their height; and his excitement on the day of the match at Lord’s was only equalled by his rage at being prevented from being there. Telegrams, it is true, reached him—about six each day—from various friends, but they only increased his excitement.

Company, of course, during those weary weeks he saw none, and his intercourse with the world was confined to grins, through a closed window, at fellows who came over to strawberries and tea in the “Sanny” garden on Sunday afternoons.

The visit of the doctor was the great event of the day, and to this was added, on Sundays, one from a kind friend (one of the masters), whom every Harrovian knows and respects. Now and then a rumour that another patient was coming to the “Sanny” would form a little excitement; but these reports were never confirmed by the event.

At last, Russell was well enough to move about the house, the mysteries of which were new to him. The various rooms—the dining room, the doctors’ room, the disinfecting room, the sitting room, were all explored, and in the last mentioned he was able to spend a good part of each day. Then came preparations for departure, among which was the custom of inscribing his name (and possibly something else) in the “book.” He was asked to compose some poetry to write in it, at which he demurred.

Others had written their names only, or copied something from Scott or Longfellow; why should he do more? However, after mature consideration, he resolved to try, at all events: it would be something to do. So he provided himself with a selection of steel pens and poetical epithets, a sheet of paper for the fair copy, and lots of foolscap for the rough, and began. No; the ideas would not flow. Closeted for hours alone, or walking up and down from one place to another, the poet laboured, but with slow result. He grew quite pale under the mental pressure.

Tiddle-de | tiddle-de | tum || tiddle-tum-tum | tiddle-de | tum-tum.||

he would mutter desperately. Then, changing the metre—

Titiddle | tiddle | tiddle | tum || ti-tiddle, | tiddle | ti.||

At last, patience and trouble were rewarded, and he one day laid on the table, with no little triumph the following lines—

“ ’Twas summer, and the little birds
 Were hopping on the trees;
 The sultry atmosphere was full
 Of little flies and bees.
 The sun rose early in the East,
 And sank into the West,
 And we poor fellows sat in school,
 With ‘phug’ and heat oppressed.
 And still the cruel master sat,
 In cap and gown arrayed,
 He would not let us doff our coats,
 However hard we prayed.
 It was not ‘dignified,’ he said,
 To sit without a coat;
 We languid sat, too hot by far
 To write a single note.

I more than all (I know not why),
 Felt the oppressive heat ;
 I melted inch by inch, I'm sure,
 While lolling in my seat.
 O ruthless master ! why did he
 Refuse so small a boon,
 To sit in shirt-sleeves, in the hot
 And broiling summer noon ?
 At last, to aid me in my woe,
 There came, one melting day,
 One of those rummy things they have,
 You know, in a Greek play—
 I know the English of the phrase
 Is 'god from a machine'—
 (Some sort of lucky chance, you know) ;
 I caught the 'Scarlatine !'
 And now I live in realms of joy,
 Where I can sit at ease,
 And wear my coat, or take it off,
 Exactly as I please.
 I drink the soothing lemonade ;
 No work assails my head,
 And I can spend much of my time
 In 'frousting' in my bed.
 O 'Sanny,' in the future days,
 When I am very hot,
 And can't take off my coat in school,
 And want a cooler spot,
 And when with lessons sore beset,
 And bothered is my brain,
 O 'Sanny,' if I only can,
 I'll turn up here again !"

The poem was rather lengthy ; but after trying in vain to cut it down, the writer entered it, in his best fist, in the "book ;" but his modesty prevented his putting more than his initials after it. About a week afterwards he left the "Sanny," and went to recruit his strength at the seaside, where we will leave him, in the hope that he will be all right next term, to begin his third year at Harrow.

CHAPTER VII.

COUSIN CHARLIE.

“Come o’er the stream, Charlie, dear Charlie, brave Charlie,
Come o’er the stream, Charlie, and dine wi’ Mac Lean;
And though you be weary, we’ll make your heart cheery,
And welcome our Charlie and his loyal train.”

SCOTCH SONG.

“OMING down to see the match?” asked Russell of Acton, a fellow in another house. “Yes; are you? let’s go down quietly, and we shan’t be too soon.” Two bill was just over, one day in footer term, when the above question and answer were exchanged. They went down accordingly past the New Schools, another fellow from Acton’s house—FitzJames—joining them. “By the way,” said Russell, “what was the row last night at your house? Devereux says you could be heard a mile off; he was at his window half the evening trying to make out what it was, and only heard a noise like a regiment of tipsy men, bawling and yelling like fury. He saw lights in your ‘Pupe’ windows, and the row seemed to come from there.” “Oh, that was ‘Chori,’” replied Acton; “don’t you know what 'Chori' is?" "Well, I've heard of it; I don't think any house has it but yours. What's it like?" "Oh, it's an awful lark; every one goes into 'Pupe,' and there's a table with a chair on it, put for fellows to stand on. Then all the 'fezes' come in with red dressing-gowns, and wearing their 'fezes.' They all sit down, facing the table, and then the fun begins. They call out all the fellows who have come into the house since last 'Chori,' (it's only once a year, you know), and they come up, one by one, and have to stand upon the chair that is put on the table. Then the 'fezes' question the fellow that's up about the footer rules, which he's supposed to have learnt. There are two fellows in house-shirts, one with a racket, and the other with a toasting-fork, who lay into the unfortunate fellow from below, whenever he makes a mistake." "But what if he knows the rules perfectly?" suggested Russell. "Oh, it's no odds; they ask humbugging questions: 'What's the fourth letter in the second word of the third rule?' or, 'What's the last word on the sheet of the rules?'" Sometimes the fellow has got up even that, and says at once the last word in the last rule; but he's dodged there, because the last thing on the sheet is the printer's name!" "It's best fun," broke in FitzJames, "when they have a great fat fellow up, or some big chap that's migrated from a 'small house.'" "Yes, and then," continued Acton, "after that, every one in the house, beginning at the 'lag,' has to get up and sing a song, holding a 'tolly,' standing upon the same chair, on the table. Some fellows can't sing a bit, but it's no matter; they have either to yell out some song, or chant a house-list, and nobody is such a muff as to do the house-list." "Wasn't McFarlane's song good?" said FitzJames. "Oh, yes, awfully; he wanted it to be awfully sentimental, and the fellows got tired, so they came in with a chorus of 'He's a jolly good fellow!' between each verse; McFarlane was awfully savage!" "Jackson's song was rattling good, too," said FitzJames; "but then that was meant to be comic, and had a splendid chorus; and 'God save the Queen' was fit to bring the roof down. By Jove! didn't we yell, just? I should think Devereux heard that, and fellows in houses much further off than his."

By this time they had reached the ground. It was awfully muddy and slippery. Play had not begun, but the two elevens were seen coming down the hill, and there were a good many spectators already. It was the first house match that year, and was expected to be a close thing. Russell and his two companions were not personally interested, as their respective houses were neither of them going to play. At last the players were ready, and the ball was kicked off. The opposite side soon ran it down to their enemy's base, but met with no little resistance; and an interesting match was just commencing, when Russell heard a voice, and turning, saw a Fourth-form boy from his house, who breathlessly informed him that there was some one waiting to see him up at the house. "Who is it?" inquired Russell. "I don't know; but I was just coming down, when Bardale told me to look sharp down, and find you, and say you were wanted."

It was provoking, after our hero had just come down, and it was going to be such a good match too. However, he couldn't help it, so he started off up the hill. How he wished, as he plodded up through the mud, that there were a tramway or something ; but it was no good thinking of impossibilities. When he arrived in his room, he found his "frouster" occupied by a stout party reading the paper. His back was turned to him as he entered, but as soon as he heard a step, the gentleman rose with a bounce, and proceeded to shake hands cordially, wringing Russell's hand nearly to a pulp in his vehemence. He was a youngish man with dark whiskers and a large moustache. As I have said, he was inclined to corpulence ; and he was dressed in the height of the fashion. "Ah ! so glad to see you, old man ; hope you're quite well." (Russell hadn't a notion who he was.) "Don't suppose you know me," he continued, "as we've never met. Your cousin Charlie, I am ; ha, ha ! thought I'd run down from town and look you up. Hope your family are quite well. I don't know much of them ; I'm only a fourth cousin, you see !" Russell had heard of a cousin Charlie, but he never thought he was a fellow like this. His cousin Charlie, he had always understood, was such a quiet sort of cove, not at all like the flashy individual before him. He began to think he was a swindler, and looked round the room to see if anything was missing ; not that it would have been worth any one's while to steal any of his books or ornaments. He could but be polite ; still, he must be on his guard.

"Let's come down and see the football, eh ?" continued Charlie, slapping him violently on the back. Russell followed the stranger diffidently, taking the opportunity of being behind, to see that his watch and money were all safe. The fellow had a very loud voice, as well as appearance. Six years in Australia had not improved his manners. As they neared the footer field, lots of fellows stared, and looked as if they were making remarks. Russell wished himself well out of it. To be seen walking with a great fat fellow, dressed in "three-man-checks," with enough jewellery for six, smoking a cigar, and talking, every now and then, loud enough to be heard at Pinner—this was altogether most unpleasant. Still he could not shake him off, and if it were really his cousin, it wouldn't do to be rude. "Aw, I was here years ago, don't ye know? Place altered wonderfully; hardly knew it, except for the Old Schools, and a few other places." Everybody could hear all he said, and Russell felt that he and his companion were objects of universal attention. "Aw, by Jupitaw! that was a good bit of play? I remember a fellow in my day, who used to 'sky' every man in the field, like so many nine-pins, and then do just what he liked with the ball!" With such remarks the stranger passed away the time until the footer bell sounded, when every one began to make their way up the hill.

As fellows passed, Russell felt that Charlie was being narrowly scrutinised, and his feeling of awkwardness did not diminish when, on reaching the house, they had to elbow their way through a lot of fellows in the passages, who stared, open-mouthed, at the stranger. Once in his room, our hero began to feel more at ease; but soon Lyon (his room-fellow) sloped in, quite unconscious that a visitor was present, with a "tosh" full of water, in "footer" clothes. "Oh, er—this is a—a cousin of mine, who has—er—come to see me," stammered

Russell, hoping Lyon would either postpone his ablutions or perform them elsewhere. But Lyon was much too dense to take the hint, and, after giving a sort of awkward bow in Charlie's direction, proceeded to divest himself of his muddy garments, utterly regardless of Russell's imploring glances. "Well," said he at last, in despair, "shall we come up to the school-yard? It's nearly time for bill." "All right," said his guest,— "must see old Sam, don't ye know? Wonder if he remembers me?" So saying, he swaggered down the passage, followed by Russell.

"If Sam remembers him, he can't be a swindler," thought he, more puzzled than ever. Oh dear, yes, Sam remembered him; that is, when he gave his name, which, by the way, did not sound like that of Russell's cousin Charlie. Our hero was about to take the bull by the horns, and ask his visitor if there wasn't some mistake; but bill was just beginning, and he didn't want to have a scene, as the stranger was talking loud enough already.

During bill, Charlie distinguished himself by swaggering up and down in the open space in the middle, until the bill-master, after eyeing him savagely for some time, sent the monitor to ask him kindly to retire, whereat he strode out of the yard in a rage, muttering angrily. Of course this episode took place before the whole school, and Russell felt more ashamed of him than ever, and determined to avoid him if possible. Accordingly, he watched him down the street, and then turned into Davies' to get his hair cut. After this he was at a loss where to go; he could not go to the house, for the awful Charlie might be in his room, and he dared not go into the school-yard or anywhere for fear of meeting him.

At last, after cautiously looking up and down the street, he ventured to Winkley's, and ordered muffins and chocolate. The shop was crowded, and it was some time before he got what he had ordered; but at last it came, and being lucky enough to secure a chair, he was just going to enjoy it, when the door was opened, and in swaggered Charlie. Of course every one looked up, and several might be seen whispering that that was the fellow that made such a row up at bill. "Aw—give me some chocolate, will you?" he said. Russell was just behind him, and was debating whether he ought to show himself, or whether he could slip out unobserved, when the difficulty was solved by Charlie, who, catching sight of him, exclaimed, "Oh, here you are, you young dog! Where have you been? I couldn't find you anywhere! Wasn't that impertinence of that fellow to order me off, up in the school-yard? Aw—I'd a good mind to punch his head for him, the insolent hound!" Russell felt ready to sink into the ground; of course every one was listening, as they couldn't help it. "Aw—let's come upstairs; nobody in the room, is there?" So saying, he walked up, Russell following.

"Now then," said he, as soon as they had reached the room, "just cut out, and bring in a few of your friends, and I'll stand you all a regular high tea!" Russell couldn't refuse, of course, so he went downstairs. Who should he ask? He couldn't introduce So-and-so, because he'd get so unmercifully chaffed about his noisy visitor. Lyon might do; he was so dense, he'd never see anything to laugh at in the whole affair. But then he'd been such a fool, beginning his "tosh," when the stranger was in the room. Never mind; perhaps he wouldn't be recognised. "Look here, come up to tea at Winkley's with me and that cove you saw; look sharp!" said he, entering his room, where Lyon was writing "lines." "Oh, I can't be bothered; I've got 'puns' by lock-up." "Oh, cut them; I'll do you some lines some day; come on, there's a good chap!" "Oh, well, I don't mind, once in a way," said Lyon, good naturedly, preparing to come. "Now for another fellow," thought Russell. He couldn't think of a suitable one. So, in despair, he collared the first Fourth-form boy he met, and said imperatively, "Now then; you're coming out to tea with me; just brush your hair and come; be sharp!"

The small boy was surprised and delighted; he had never been taken so much notice of before, and a good feed for nothing was not to be despised! So he came very willingly, and soon afterwards Russell, with his two recruits, was seated with Charlie, doing justice to a sumptuous meal in Winkley's upper room. There was no doubt as to the stranger's liberality—fish, hot meat, eggs, cold meat, tea and coffee, pastry, all put in an appearance; and the guests made up for their dearth of conversation by feeding heartily. Before they had finished, lock-up bell rang, and bidding a hasty good-night to their host (who observed that he would see Russell next day), they departed, arriving at the house just as the door was being shut.

That evening Russell pondered over the adventures of the afternoon, but could make nothing of them. There must be a mistake. He had dropped his suspicious view of the stranger. To be sure, he was a regular brick to stand such a tea, but he wished he were not quite such a remarkable character, and didn't talk so awfully loud.

Next day was Sunday. At first chapel, coming in late, with very creaky boots, and wading among the "toppers," Charlie was to be seen swaggering up the aisle. His personal charms were enhanced by a frock coat and a gorgeous crimson tie, while he carried a white top hat, and wore an eyeglass. (This last ornament he had not worn on the preceding day, so it must have been part and parcel of his Sunday attire.) After service, coming down the aisle, he caught sight of Russell, to whom he gave a familiar nod, making our hero wish himself anywhere but where he was.

Nothing more was seen of Charlie till about ten o'clock, when he appeared in Russell's room and proposed a walk before second chapel. While they were out, the conversation turned on home affairs. "Let's see; you must be about sixteen. Ah! yes, I remember, your poor brother was two years older." Russell stopped dead, and looked him in the face. "I never had a brother," he said; "there must be a mistake." "Mistake! nonsense; why you'll be telling me next that your name isn't Bertie Russell, I suppose!" "My name is Hugh Russell," replied he. "Why, then, aren't you the son of old John Russell, of Dellinghurst; and wasn't your mother a Miss Grove?" "No, I'm the only son of Mr. Russell, the Q.C., of whom you may have heard."

The "Comedy of Errors" was soon cleared up. Of course our hero was not Charlie's cousin. That worthy produced a letter in which the John Russell he had spoken of wrote, "Bertie is getting on well at school; I am sure a public-school life is doing him good. Perhaps if you are in town, you could run down and see him; it is not far by rail." And to this alone was traceable the whole series of mistakes. The impetuous Charlie, being a Harrow man himself, never doubted that the public school near London referred to, was the "ancient school on the hill;" but now he thought it over, he fancied it must be Eton; and, in fact, he had some recollection, now he tried to remember, that Bertie Russell was at Eton; and as there was no one of the name at Harrow, besides our hero, he supposed it must be so. On his arrival at Harrow, he had asked the first fellow he met if he knew any one of the name of Russell, and if so, where he boarded, and the result we know.

Russell was long afterwards "chaffed" about his pseudo-relative, and at house-singing a solo was always demanded of him of "Come o'er the stream, Charlie!"

CHAPTER VIII.

THE "EX."

"A glimpse of home, and then away,
Back to the round of work and play—
A happy dream that soon was fled—
Things that were done, and thought, and said :
Was it for this we sighed and strained,
Of which the memory scarce remained ?
Nay, say not so ; those few short hours
Refreshed us, roused our flagging powers ;
To duty we returned once more,
Still heartier, stronger, than before."

ANON.

FOURTH school on the Friday evening of the "Ex." All the bother of getting "Ex-letters" and "Ex-papers" was over ; all the suspense, all the threats of stopped "Exes," all the hopes and fears dependent on the discretion (or what the fellows thought caprice) of masters, were at an end. Even the formal entry of the monitor, followed by the reading out the names of those whose papers were signed, had taken place, and nothing remained for the Ex-goers in Russell's form but to sit quiet till the clock struck. The master had hit on this.

peculiarly tantalising way of making the time seem longer. At the beginning of school, lots of questions had been asked among the fellows. "I say; I've been packing my bag, and cut the 'con' dead; d'you think he'll stop my 'Ex' if I skew it?" asked one, anxiously. "Is there any chance of his letting us out early?" inquired another, though he well knew that masters are never so aggravatingly punctual as at the school before the "Ex."

At last the master came up, and soon every one was in his place. One after another had been "put on;" nobody "skewed;" and they got through the lesson before the hour was over.

Glances were exchanged, clearly denoting a hope of an early release. Not a bit of it. The master sat still, took out his watch; ten minutes more. Fellows grabbed at their hats and books, and sat on the very edges of the forms, like cats about to spring. Then the master gave out in a provokingly deliberate way, the small amount of work expected in the "Ex" from those who were not going. How uninteresting it seemed to the anxious Ex-goers! Somebody thought he heard the clock strike, and accordingly stirred, whereupon half a dozen fellows made a stampede for the door, one sprawling in the middle of the floor in his anxiety to depart. But they had to return to their seats, looking foolish enough. "Four minutes and a half," quoth the master, "killing an animal which had crept from his book. Then he began to mend a pen; after which he again consulted his watch, announcing that in "three minutes and a quarter" they might go.

Russell was among the happy "signed," and was to spend the "Ex" with Lyon, in London, his own people being out of town. He had had several narrow shaves of having his "Ex" stopped by various masters, who had seemed to take a peculiar delight in holding out this threat; so much so that our hero had been provoked on one occasion, after the oft-repeated threat had been brought out, to observe that the joke was a trifle stale, which piece of impertinence nearly cost him his "Ex." But, as I have said, suspense was now at an end, and at length the wished-for moment arrived, and a second rush was made to the door (that is by the Ex-goers, the others taking it more leisurely). It was a foggy November evening as Russell and Lyon, bags in hand, sped down the hill. Many were the invitations from passers-by to take a place in a fly (already containing five fellows, and two on the box), but they heeded not. On they ran, passing and being passed by other foot passengers. It was very dark, and once Lyon ran head first into a ditch, where he lay sprawling till pulled out by the legs by Russell; other fellows were much too hurried to stop and assist. Luckily, the ditch was comparatively dry, so a small portion of mud, a battered hat, and a torn umbrella, were the sole results of the fall. At last the station was reached, and after the usual bustle for tickets, the two found themselves on the crowded platform. In a few moments the train came up, and a rush was made. Russell and Lyon were fortunate enough to get places in a first-class carriage, and by the light of its lamp Lyon brushed his garments which had suffered in the ditch. Willesden was soon reached, and here they got out and went up the stairs to the upper station, where a quarter of an hour was spent in reading the advertisements.

When the train came up, it was no easy thing to find a place. It seemed to be full of people returning from their day's work. Trains do not wait long on the Metropolitan lines, so the two had hardly got into a third-class carriage before they were off. Sitting room there was none, as the occupants already consisted of four labourers, three volunteers, a snuffy old gentleman, evidently of Jewish extraction, with his son (a youth of unwashed appearance), and an old lady, who was the very ideal of Mrs. Gamp, umbrella and all. Lyon declined with thanks this kind old lady's offer of a seat on her knees; while Russell, with equal firmness and politeness, resented the efforts of the Jewish gentleman to make a place into which he might squeeze between him and his hopeful son. So they stood up, one at each window, trying to catch a little fresh air, as the atmosphere of the compartment was close, to say the least of it. At last the train stopped suddenly, sending Russell into the arms of one of the labourers, who received him with a volley of the abuse for which the British workman is so justly famed, while Lyon was soon receiving a hardly more polite reprimand from the old Jew, on whose toe the sudden stoppage of the train had caused him to tread. But all troubles have an end, and before many minutes had passed, the two found themselves driving in a hansom through the streets of South Kensington.

At length they pulled up before Sir Walter Lyon's house. The family were dining out, so the two were left to their own devices. After a solemn dinner, the solemnity of which was increased by the presence of the solemn butler, the two young bachelors sallied forth in a hansom to the Gaiety Theatre, where they found a capital farce, and met several of their schoolfellows. On their return home, Russell was introduced to his host and hostess, their eldest son, Harry, and their two daughters, grown-up young ladies.

Next day, after breakfast, the two friends set out in search of amusement; and, after doing some of the South Kensington Museum, and some shopping, went to lunch at the Criterion, from whence they made their way to the Christy Minstrels' afternoon performance. It was some time since either of them had witnessed the ever new and varied extravagances of this company, and for weeks afterwards their room at Harrow would resound, while they were dressing, with choice duets they had picked up at the St. James's Hall. The jokes too, and the farce at the end, were as good as ever, and Russell acquired the art of alighting sittingwise on a chair, with his legs rigidly stuck together up in the air, and his name not seldom appeared in the "break-age-list" for the remainder of the term in consequence. They returned home for dinner, after which they went off together, in company with Harry Lyon, to see "Our Boys." They had a box to themselves, from whence they got a good view of the stage and audience. Among the latter, Russell saw no less a person than "cousin Charlie;" and what was more, Charlie saw him, and made frantic efforts to catch his eye. At last, between the acts, Charlie was seen to leave his seat, and soon the door of their box opened, and a well-known voice was heard, saying, "Hullo, youngster, how are you?" and, taking possession of the remaining chair, Charlie sat down, and stayed till the end of the piece. He had found out his real cousin at Eton, he said, and thought him a slow young ass, and wished he'd stuck to his first-found relative. This he seemed fully determined to do now at any rate, and would only reluctantly take an excuse from Russell for not coming to supper with him at his club. However, they managed to shake him off at last, and returned home.

Next day was Sunday, which was spent in the morning by going to church, and in the afternoon by visiting the Zoo.

Monday morning saw the two once more at Harrow, racing up the hill, late for second school. They had to get their books, and change their coats, and, on reaching their room, they found most of the former had disappeared. This, they subsequently discovered, was caused by a black-mail, levied by the fellows in the house who had not gone for their "Ex," and who, to while away the time, had extemporised a billiard-table and its appliances out of an ordinary table, with books for cushions, and umbrellas for cues. Moreover, they had got up a fancy-ball, whereby the wardrobe of the Ex-goers had suffered—even their towels and curtains being taken for apparel. So that Russell could neither lay hands on his books nor on a pair of "tails," so he had to go up late, and hot, with somebody else's books (which were pounced on by the master), and a coat nearly down to his heels, the property of a tall neighbour. He vowed he would get locks put to his clothes-press and book-cupboard, which he did, but found the doors of both burst open a few days afterwards, by some one in a hurry, he supposed.

He was not such a sufferer as some of his neighbours, however, one of whom had returned from his "Ex" to find all his ornaments smashed, and two pictures with the glasses cracked; an occurrence accounted for by the fact that his open door had been made one of the bases of a spirited game of "passage-footer."

CHAPTER IX.

COCK-HOUSE MATCH.

" Routs and discomfitures, rushes and rallies,
Bases attempted, and rescued, and won,
Strife without anger, and art without malice—
How will it seem to you forty years on?
Then, you will say, not a feverish minute
Strained the weak heart and the wavering knee,
Never the battle raged hottest but in it,
Neither the last nor the faintest were we!
Follow up! Follow up!! Follow up!!!
Till the field ring again and again,
With the tramp of the twenty-two men,
Follow up! Follow up!!"

HARBOW FOOTBALL SONG.

A DULL morning, made still more dull by a persistent drizzle, which threatened ruin to any new "straw" which its owner was incautious enough to take out for its first airing.

The weather showed no sign of clearing, and Russell stood at the house door meditating. Cock-house match was to be played that afternoon, and his house was one of the rivals. He did not feel in particularly good "form," and was a trifle despondent on the subject ; perhaps the weather had something to do with his melancholy frame of mind.

It will be remembered that he had got his "fez" the year before, so a house match was a familiar thing to him. But a cock-house match—that meant something more. If only he felt up to it, what wonders he would do ; but somehow it seemed that his wind, his running, and his powers altogether had been declining the last few days. So at least, in his present state of mind, he fancied ; for no one had found fault with his play of late. By and by Lyon came out, on his way up town, and Russell, discovering that he had borrowed his umbrella, had to remonstrate, as he would soon want it himself. This little event turned the train of our hero's thoughts, and after he had seen Lyon off the premises with an umbrella other than his own, he returned to his room to prepare his garments for the great contest. He was not usually particular as to his dress at "footer," but on such a great occasion he felt it his duty to the house to present as smart an appearance as possible ; so he selected the most spotless pair of duck-knickerbockers, and the least faded house-shirt, after which he took down his "house-match fez" from its peg of honour over the mantelpiece (he had three, one for house matches, another for ordinary use, and a third for wet weather), brushed it carefully, and combed its silken tassel. Then he took out a woollen comforter of house colours, to "go down" in, and a "fez-belt," and next proceeded to see to the stockings and boots. After all his preparations were finished, he went "up town" to gather intelligence of the enemy's forces.

At dinner he eat of the beefsteak, which the forethought of the matron had provided, and of course abstained from pudding. After the meal he repaired to his room, where he beat up an egg he had previously procured, with hot water and a little sherry that had been in his travelling flask since the holidays.

This strength-giving mixture he drank out of his tooth-glass, and gave some to Lyon, who pronounced it "beastly," but, nevertheless, seemed to place unlimited faith in its powers.

After bill they "changed" as quickly as possible, and marched down to the field in procession, headed by "Jimmy" Belfield, who was captain of the "footer," as well as cricket that year, and whose popularity was greater than ever. Amongst the players whose names are known to the reader were Burton, Leigh, and Vernon. The last of these had not got his "fez," but was first "choice," as the list now stood.

The rain had ceased, but the ground was in a fearfully slippery state. Their opponents were on the ground before them, and there was some discussion as to whether this was a good omen or not. The whole school seemed to be on the ground, to say nothing of masters, old Harrovians, and a fair sprinkling of ladies. Then there was the usual knot of school-servants, tradesmen, and "chaws." Altogether Russell, as he stripped, thought he had never seen the ropes so crowded, and he felt on his mettle. Play soon began, Russell's house (which, for convenience, we shall call the "black and white") defending the base furthest from "Ducker." The wind was in their favour, and before long Burton managed to run the ball between the enemy's poles. The cheers were tremendous; one would have thought that the shouts would never stop. But now a harder task lay before the "black and white" side. The wind right in their teeth, to which was now added driving rain, made it no easy matter to work the ball up to their opponents base, and after a long and hard struggle, during which it was difficult to say who were getting the best of it, so exactly in the middle region did the ball keep, a well-directed kick by the captain of the other side made the state of affairs equal.

And it seemed as if the day's play would result in a tie. Half-time passed, but still no more bases for either side were kicked. The excitement grew intense. Every "run-up," every fall, every catch, was made the subject of deafening applause. The ground was literally covered with lemons. "Ten minutes more," shouted some bystander, "play up!" "Five minutes only!" was soon the cry, and it seemed as if it were too late for any decision of the match that day. Some fellows, indeed, among the onlookers, began to make their way up the hill, thinking nothing more was to be seen. But they were mistaken. A final effort was made by both elevens; the play got faster than ever; not a laggard was to be seen in the field.

In a lucky moment Russell took the ball from an advancing foeman, and succeeded in making a splendid "run-up," dodging one after another of his opponents. He was well followed up, and when, almost dead beat, he stumbled and fell, "Jimmy" Belfield took the ball on till he was up again, when he gave our hero a catch. The suspense was breathless. "Be quick; no time to lose!" cried somebody. All depended on him. To "be quick" without getting flurried, is no easy thing, especially when the result of "cock-house match" depends on your success or failure. A dead silence; every eye is upon him. One quick glance, and he runs forward; the ball soars in the air, and falls between and behind the poles. Not a moment too soon. Before the ball has stopped rolling, before every one has realised what has happened, the bell begins, all doubt is at an end, and Kingsford's is cock-house for the year.

For a few moments our hero hardly realised the feat he had performed, but he was soon roused to a sense of it by the congratulations and praises that poured in from all sides. As the players went up the hill, too, he received sundry slaps on the back from enthusiastic friends; and when they neared the House, the scene of triumph came to its climax. The street was full of fellows; the house door was crowded; and as each player entered the house, he was received with loud applause. When the fellows caught sight of Russell, nothing would satisfy them but to carry him into the house in triumph; nor did they release him till they had landed him, clothes and all, in a hot bath in his room, which they had prepared for him. After his ablutions, the old butler showed his loyalty by bringing him some hot cocoa. After four he received company in his room, sitting enthroned in his "frouster," which, rickety at all times, succumbed under the weight of our hero's newly-acquired honours, and let him down on the carpet, in the midst of the Levée.

That evening a grand spread was given in the Hall; speeches were made, and sherry-glasses broken. Of course, Russell was the hero of the evening, though many others of the players were "toasted." After the spread, Russell was invited on to the "private side," to be shown off and patted on the back by the ladies, and this ordeal was the worst of any to him, as he was never brilliant in company, and on this particular evening he felt more than usually awkward, submitting to his pattings and compliments with that air of resignation peculiar to small dogs and school-boys who have done something out of the ordinary. He was altogether glad to escape from the drawing-room to his own humbler apartment, which he found crowded with fellows, all talking at once, the subject of conversation being, of course, the house match. "Did you see ——'s run up?" "Who was it that got hurt, about half-time; one of the ——ites?" "Wasn't that a good kick of Russell's?" &c., &c.

Our hero's entrance was the signal for another violent demonstration of approval, from which he barely escaped with his life. On the whole, he was not sorry, on a by-no-means-invented plea of fatigue, to retire early to bed, with leave to "stop out" next day from first school. He slept soundly—so soundly that he did not even dream, as might be expected, of the exciting scenes he had gone through during the day. But next morning he awoke with a two-fold consciousness of something pleasant: Firstly, that his house was cock-house, and secondly, that he was signed for first school. And with these sweet reflections, he turned over to enjoy his well-won "froust."

CHAPTER X.

"TRIALS."

"Some book-worms will sit, and will study
Alone, with their dear selves alone,
Till their brain like a mill-pond grows muddy,
And their heart is as cold as a stone.
But listen to what I now say, boys,
Who know the fine art to unbend,
All labour, without any play, boys,
Makes Jack a dull boy in the end."

OLD SONG.

RUSSELL was very anxious to secure his "remove," and, as his "quarter-marks" placed him in an uncertain position, he took to regular hard work for "trials." Never had he spent such a "trial-week." This period had usually been to him one of idle excitement, as he never did anything towards getting up his work, preferring to take his chance as the papers came, looking upon the whole as a sort of game of hazard, in which he was, as a rule, fairly successful. But this term it was altogether different. He was determined to get his "remove" at any cost. Accordingly, when the list of "trials" was read out, he made a table of them, and stuck it up in his room as a guide and reminder.

All his spare time on Sunday was occupied in reading up abstracts of Bible history, and making systematic notes. Then he got all the commentaries he could, and read through several hundred pages of Stanley's "Jewish Church," and such works. His labours were not nearly finished by bedtime, and he determined to risk being "twug" in the act of "tollying up." Luckily for him and Lyon (who joined him in his preparation), Mr. K. did not come round the house that night; so the two sat on, hard at work till about twelve, when, feeling sleepy, they gave up the remainder of their good intentions, and turned in.

Next day, seven o'clock (barbarous hour!) saw them in school. It was quite dark, and the gas was necessary almost till the end of school. Russell came out feeling very fairly satisfied with his work, but vexed that he should have had to miss several questions that he might have done if he had prolonged his work the night before. He was determined it should not occur again. Accordingly, before beginning "tollying-up" that night, he made arrangements to defeat any inclination to sleep, with tea and other things. After being nearly "twug" twice, he continued his work in peace. At twelve he again became sleepy, but swallowed some strong tea, and walked about the room, to the annoyance of the dozing Lyon. This had the desired effect, and he returned to his books like a giant refreshed. After he had been working for about an hour, his "tolly" burnt itself out; so he started off in the dark with a match-box to forage for another. Groping along the passage, the first door he came to was that of Parkes, a Sixth-form fellow. After several ineffectual attempts to arouse the sleeping owner, Russell bagged a "tolly" off the mantelpiece, and returned to work. But his proceedings were soon stopped by the "tolly" going suddenly out—a phenomenon which was explained on the following morning by the discovery that it was what Parkes called a "decoy" candle, viz., one from which all the wick had been carefully extracted, except half-an-inch or so left at one end. "Teach fellows to come bagging my 'tollies,'" remarked Parkes.

A second expedition was more successful, and Russell did not give over work till two, when he had promised to wake several fellows who preferred sleep before work. First there was Burton. Never was there such a fellow to sleep. Russell vowed that he would never again undertake the waking of him. He called him: no answer. He called again: only a grunt. He shook him: two grunts. He pulled the clothes off: a muttered expostulation. After this had gone on for some minutes, our hero thought him of water. Water he accordingly tried. The abuse which followed was tremendous, but not sufficient to arouse the sleeper, who, after sitting up in bed, threatening to throw a boot at the intruder, and using strong epithets, lay down again, and composed himself to sleep. One more effort the conscientious Russell made, but it was the last; and he soon left the room, followed by a boot, a brush, and the jug of water, which smashed against the wall; and as he retreated down the passage he heard Burton snoring again, as if nothing had happened.

The next two fellows were easier to wake, but the third was almost as difficult as Burton had been, only that he was not so active. He suffered himself to be pulled out of bed, and was at once fast asleep on the floor, where in the end Russell left him, having no more time to waste, as he wished to return to his room and commence his long postponed slumbers. In the morning, owing to his short sleep, he was so drowsy all first school that he could hardly do the paper; and he resolved not to sit up again, but to try the early-rising dodge in future.

Next day there was Greek, and our hero thought he knew the "con" and parsing pretty well; but, strange to say, he had not a notion of the story of the books the form had read during the term. Accordingly he repaired to Penfield's room. Penfield was a clever fellow, in the Sixth form, who did everybody's work except his own, which he seemed to know by intuition; a "rep" he read through once and knew, while "cons" he could do off at sight, as easily as he could read the newspaper.

As Russell entered his room, he found it occupied by about six fellows, big and little, all seeking help from the oracle. When he could get in a word, our hero addressed himself to Penfield, who sat in state in his "frouster." "Oh, I say; just tell us the story of this Homer, will you? I know the con, but if they ask the plot, I'm done for!" "Oh, I really haven't time," replied the learned one, "I've promised to give Crawdon a 'con' of an Odyssey, and Leigh a 'con' of some Horace, and then there are some fellows coming at ten to be put up to some dodges in algebra, and I've got to do a lot of 'jambics' for Parbury, and a 'teek' exercise for Donaldson, besides some trigonometry and a German 'con' for Stoner, and as to my own trial-work, I've not looked at it at all yet; no I really haven't got time!"

"Oh, I'll tell you the yarn of your Homer," exclaimed Crawdon; "come into my room, I know it off beautifully; I'll be back in a few minutes, Penfield!" he added, and the two left the den of learning together. "Now then," said Crawdon, as soon as they were seated over his fire, "Ninth Odyssey, isn't it? Very well; open your book. You see, at the beginning of the ninth book, Ulysses is sitting on the hearthrug in Alcinous' best room. (You know he has just had a fit of blubbering, and Alcinous caught him at it, so he told the fiddler to hold his row, because it seemed to bore Ulysses. All that is preliminary. Well, then; now begins the ninth book.) Ulysses begins his yarn; first, he says that having a spread isn't half bad fun; then he says that his name is Ulysses, and tells them that he is an awful card, and no end of a nailer, and all that. Then he starts his real story. He says that when they left Troy they got among some coves called Ciconians, whose town they sacked, but who afterwards gave them a drubbing. So they got into their ships, and sailed off till they came to a rummy place where there lived a set of fellows who did nothing but eat buttercups. Some of Ulysses' men went on shore, but they stayed there, eating buttercups too; so Ulysses lugged them down into the boat, and pinned them under the seats, and rowed off somewhere else. The next place they came to was an island near the place where Cyclops and his friends lived. Ulysses and twelve of his fellows went to look about them, and came to the cave where this monster lived. (He was a big lout with one eye, you know. I think he was called ‘Polly-famous;’ but don’t bother about that; just call him ‘Cyclops.’) Ulysses ‘specked’ on getting a hospitable present, but he was sold there, for when the Cyclops came back, after talking a little he ate up a brace of men, which put the others rather in a funk. Next day, when Cyclops woke up, he saw to his flocks, and then thought he’d like some breakfast, so he took so to speak, ‘two of men, without *’ (without mercy, I suppose). Then he stuck a big stone in the door-way, and went out. While he was out, that dodger Ulysses hit upon a plan, so he got a big stick (he says it was as big as the mast of a merchant-ship, but that’s all my eye, because he couldn’t have lifted it). Well, he and his fellows cut and burnt the stick into a point, and hid it. When Cyclops came back, he eat two more fellows, and then Ulysses gave him some wine, which made him awfully drunk. While he was asleep. Ulysses and his men made the stick red-hot, and rammed it into the old man’s eye. He sang out, but it was no good; they gouged away at his eye till it came out by the roots. After that, some of the Cyclops-chaps came, and asked him what was up, but he said, ‘Oh, nothing at all!’ (it’s some stupid pun in the Greek), so they chaffed him, and went home. Next day, when old Cyclops drove his cattle into the fields, he didn’t know that Ulysses and his fellows were hanging on underneath the animals’ stomachs, but that was their little game; and the next that the old chap heard was Ulysses

* Vide Glossary.

chaffing him from the ship, for he had got on board and bagged all the sheep. When Cyclops heard that, he was awfully savage, so he got a stone and whizzed it at the ship, nearly sinking it. Then he tried to get Ulysses to come back, and said he'd make it awfully jolly for him, and all that, but Ulysses wasn't quite such a fool, so he giped at the old fellow again, who swore heavily, and buzzed another stone at his head. Then they got back to the other fellows, and had a spread; and there the book ends! By Jove! time for me to go up!" So saying he snatched up his blotting-pad, and rushed out of the room, leaving our hero to commit to memory the tale he had heard. Really though, it did him good, for when he saw in the paper, "Give a short sketch of the story narrated by Ulysses in Od. IX.," he was able to put together a very creditable answer.

Another help, too, he got from Crawdon, which, however, turned out less successfully. Crawdon did German; Russell did French. Before the "trial" in Modern Languages, the two exchanged some knowledge. "Look here," said Crawdon, "if you tell me some French, I'll tell you some German; and then we can both do some questions, besides our own papers, and we'll score awfully!" Accordingly Russell told Crawdon a few things likely to appear in the French paper, and "conned" some pieces to him, after which Crawdon said—"Thanks! now let me 'con' you a bit of German. I'll do the likeliest bit, one that we've been over a dozen times. It is almost certain to be set. I have the 'con' written out, and you can learn it like a 'rep'; then, when you see the piece in the paper, you can just set to, and write it out in English from memory!" "But I don't know a word of German—I can't even read all the letters," objected Russell. "Oh, never mind; look here, the heading of the piece is Der geheilte Hund, which means 'The cured dog.' You will know if it is the same piece by the Hund (think of hound), and then all you've got to do is to write out the 'con' from memory." Accordingly, Crawdon "conned" it through, and gave a written "con" to his pupil, who learned it off like a "rep." When he got into school, after he had finished the French paper, he turned his attention to the German. Sure enough, there was the magic word! (It was spelt Hunde, but that did not matter, he thought.) So down went the story of the "cured dog." He was very much elated at his success, and made sure that he would get a "copy" in Modern Languages. He did not see Crawdon till after tea, when that young gentleman at once began, "Oh, I'm awfully sorry that German piece wasn't set! I made sure it would be." "What? not set?" replied Russell in astonishment, "it was set, and what is more, I did it rattling well!" Then, and only then, it struck him that there might be more than one piece of German, in the heading of which the word Hund occurred! The piece actually set was quite different from the one he had translated; and next time Modern Languages "Trial" came round, he did not aspire to the German paper.

I have before said that our hero had renounced sitting up to do "Trial" work, and had determined to rise early instead. The first time he tried this, the clock which he had borrowed failed to go off at the required time, and Russell did not, therefore, rise till the usual hour, and, in consequence, did a very feeble paper.

Next night, he borrowed a clock which was warranted never to fail. In order that it might make a sufficient noise, he placed it at the bottom of a basin, which he set on a chair by his bed. Sure enough, it went off at three (the hour at which he had set it), startling the sleeper, so that he gave his head a severe bang against the back of the bedstead. The clock did not cease warbling for about ten minutes; its internal commotion causing it, all the time, to walk about, and attempt to scale the sides of the basin. Once roused, our hero set to his work with a will, and had done several hundred lines of Virgil before he remembered that he had promised to wake some fellows. This done, he found it was time to join a "swotting-party," to which he had been invited. The hour fixed was 4.30 A.M. When Russell entered the room, he saw that most of the party had assembled. Besides the owners of the room, there were Burton, in a dressing gown of gorgeous pattern, Leigh, with a tail coat over his night-shirt, and Vernon, in a house-shirt and a pair of trousers (he said he always wore flannel next his skin in the early morning). The room looked out on the street. The birds were already singing, or rather, making a row. It is a peculiarity of the Harrow birds, that they are never heard or seen by day, but, whenever one is "tollying-up," these nocturnal creatures kick up the most awful row—not singing, but shrieking with all their might.

"Let's have something to warm us, before we begin swotting," said somebody. Accordingly, before long, thanks to an Etna and some mysterious tins, they were all eating hare soup, steaming hot, out of soap-dishes, tooth-glasses, and chimney ornaments. In the midst of the feast, there was heard a strange noise outside, and on everybody rushing to the window, they saw, by the light of a neighbouring street lamp, a man—evidently the worse for liquor, seated in a puddle in the middle of the road, addressing himself to anybody who cared to listen. Finding he had an audience, he became more loquacious; but before long "somno vinoque sepultus" curled himself up on the pavement, and was soon snoring loudly. So loudly did he make his sleeping condition known, that no one could attend to their work. Some one suggested dousing him with water, but, fearing he might become abusive, they refrained. As last he rose, and staggered into the porch, where he continued his sleep, terrifying the maid who opened the door an hour later to clean the steps. By the time that they had watched him into the porch, the "swotting-party" found it was about 5.30, and as no one felt inclined to work, after a second brew of hare soup, they went off round the house to torment their sleeping neighbours. The amount of work done by our hero, at the "swotting-party," was absolutely nil, nor were the others much more industrious.

He resolved never again to swot for "Trials," except by himself or with one other fellow, and he carried out his resolution for the few remaining "Trials" that term.

In "Trial-rep" he was very lucky; but his viva-voce Euclid cost him some trouble. But what were all his labours when, at the beginning of next term, he found he had secured his much desired "Remove"?

CHAPTER XI.

RATS.

"RATS !

They fought the dogs, and killed the cats,
And bit the babies in the cradles,
And ate the cheeses out of the vats,
And licked the soup from the cook's own ladles,
Split open the kegs of salted sprats,
Made nests inside men's Sunday hats,
And even spoiled the women's chats,
By drowning their speaking
With shrieking and squeaking,
In fifty different sharps and flats.

* * * * *

Great rats, small rats, lean rats, brawny rats,
Brown rats, black rats, gray rats, tawny rats."

BROWNING'S "Pied Piper of Hamelin."

IT was the middle of Easter term; "footer" just over, and running, about to begin regularly. Our hero stood at the house door in deep thought. The previous night he had had his patience sorely tried by a rat hunt in his room. Just as he was going to his press to get out a clean shirt for next day, a big piebald rat had jumped out of the lowest shelf, and run off under the bed. Just then the gas went out suddenly (as it always did about 10.15), so Russell, fearing to tread with bare feet on the floor, and having no matches, had sat, half undressed on his bed, in terror of an assault. At last, in walked his tutor, candle in hand. The two, aided by Lyon, had had an unsuccessful hunt, and the master, half suspecting that the rat was imaginary, and an excuse for Russell's not being in bed, went off, leaving our hero still in a deadly funk. He had passed a wretched night; for the animal kept scrambling about, now here, now there, and whenever our hero dropped asleep it was to dream of rats. At last he took courage to climb over the table to the door, which he set open, in the hope that his visitor would take the hint. Not a bit of it; and after an hour or so, Lyon, whose bed was nearest the door, declared he wouldn't stand the draught any longer.

The rat had not been found yet. "What if it should die, and make a stink behind my hat-box!" thought Russell. But greater troubles were in store for him.

The animal, it seemed, had escaped from No. 18, a room belonging to two small fellows who kept quite a menagerie. They had a guinea-pig, three white rats, two piebald rats (of which Russell's disturber was one), a cage full of white mice, and a family of dormice, which lived in Henderson's "Ex-bag." None but the owners, Henderson and Scrapfield could enter the room, without being nearly knocked down; the monkey-house at the Zoo was nothing to it. It was stated that Scrapfield always had three or more mice in his jacket pocket, and it was quite certain that one had walked out one evening on to the hall-table at prayers. Henderson once took a white rat into school, but the Master "twigging" it, watched his opportunity, "nailed" it in the paper-basket, and sent its owner home with his rat, plus two hundred lines. The rat and mouse-nuisance was getting too much of a good thing in the house. "Find"-cupboards were infested and pillaged, rooms scented, fellows tormented, boots nibbled, collars devoured. But the whole affair came to a climax when Russell, the night after his rat-hunt, having satisfied himself that the room was clear, got into bed, and found something gnawing at his toes. Whether by accident or design, two white-rats had found their way between the sheets.

Next day, roused by complaints on all sides, a council of Sixth-form fellows was held, to determine what steps should be taken to abate the nuisance. The Head of the House presided, and in his room the council met. Before long they resolved themselves into a committee of inquiry, and in the evening marched in state into No. 18, holding their noses. They found the room in a fearful state of untidiness. The table was thrust into a corner; a broken chair lay in the fender; and Henderson sat in the middle of the floor, trying to force something that looked like mud into the guinea-pig's mouth, with a spoon. He looked rather startled on the entrance of the authorities, but continued his efforts with the struggling animal. "What are you doing to that poor brute?" asked the Head of the House, speaking from behind a handkerchief saturated with eau-de-cologne. "Oh, I didn't think Samuel had been quite well lately," replied Henderson, "so I'm giving him some medicine." "What is your beastliness made of?" interposed another of the Sixth form. "Oh, it is bread and mustard and sugar and water, with some camphor." "No wonder the beast won't eat it, then!" replied the questioner; "Where is Scrapfield?" "He is gone to the tap for hot water, because it is Arthur's bath-night." "Who may Arthur be?" asked the Head of the House. "Why, Arthur is the biggest piebald rat." "Oh, the brute I caught in my coal-scuttle!" remarked some one. "How many beasts have you altogether?" continued the Head, sniffing at his handkerchief. "Well, let's see; five rats and the guinea-pig, thirteen white mice, and seven dormice. And then Scrapfield has bought a rabbit, which is to live under his bed." "Where do the rest of the brutes live?" "Oh, the mice have a cage, and the dormice are in an 'Ex-bag,' and the rats are in the wash-hand-stand cupboards, and the guinea-pig—the guinea-pig——." "Well, speak out; where does the guinea-pig live?" "Why, he used to live in my clothes-press, before he was ill." "Yes, and where does he live now?" "Well," (this reluctantly), "he sleeps in my bed now!" A roar of laughter greeted this confession. "Where did you get all the beasts?" pursued the Head. "Oh, chiefly through the Exchange and Mart; we answer the advertisements." "Are all the brutes in the room just now?" asked one of the Sixth form, with a sort of shudder. "All except one of the white rats, and we don't know where he has got to." "I do, though!" exclaimed a new-comer, catching the words; "he is down in your 'Find'-cupboard, eating ham," turning to the Head of the House. "By jove! is he though?" and with that the irate Head turned, followed by the others,

Henderson bringing up the rear, praying that mercy might be shown to the culprit. Sure enough, there was the white rat in the cupboard. Nobody would touch it but Henderson, who embraced it tenderly, and retired with it in his arms. Then, after burning a pastille in the "Find"-cupboard, the committee sat, and called in witnesses, one by one. First came Russell, who recounted both his experiences. Then came Crawdon, who deposed that on Saturday night he had come into his room, and (in the fullest sense of the words) had "smelt a rat." That on his going for the fire-irons to attack the animal, if he could discover it, he had found one of his slippers entirely spoilt by being torn and gnawed. The next witness proved that on three separate occasions his sleep had been disturbed by mice, while a fourth alleged that the contents of his "Find"-cupboard, viz., a chicken, a tongue, two pots of jam, some tinned meat, and a packet of sugar, had been rendered "unfit for human food," by the depredations of rats. Other witnesses told of the destruction of books, clothes, etc. After all the witnesses had retired, the council laid their heads together, finally deciding that the obnoxious animals must be removed. How, was the question. To take them by force from the owners would be no easy matter; besides, no one liked touching them. It was a case requiring deep consideration. That night, the Head of the House, having put some more eau-de-cologne on his handkerchief, paid another visit to the room, and told Henderson and Scrapfield that if the menagerie was not disposed of in twenty-four hours, the Sixth form would forfeit the whole stock of animals.

But two days having passed, and the offenders having disregarded the warning, another council was held, which resulted in a plan of selling the animals to a respectable old pedlar, who said that he could dispose of them easily in the villages through which he passed. He was to come one day during first school, while Henderson and Scrapfield were "up ;" one of the Sixth form was to stay out on that day to receive the man, and make the bargain. And so it was that the owners of the animals one day returned from first school to find their room untenanted by a single guinea-pig, rat, or mouse. That night the Head of the House came round, and forbidding them to get any more beasts, on any pretence whatever, paid down half the sum realised by the sale, saying that the other half would be given to the cricket fund, after compensation for devoured food, etc., had been made to those who had suffered by the rats and mice.

Long afterwards Henderson and Scrapfield went about, mourning for their lost pets, but the house has not since been troubled with vermin. Russell, for weeks afterwards, made his bed afresh every night, to see if anything was to be found between the sheets. And, till the day he left, there stuck to him (the chief sufferer from the great nuisance) the nickname of "Rats."

CHAPTER XII.

DECORATIONS.

"Nay sir; but verily, as a garden without plants, as a hearth without a fire, as a speech without meaning, so is an apartment destitute of embellishment.

"I like it not; for, be it never so spacious, it lacketh comfort, and it is comfort that maketh the home."

SAYINGS OF SIR TITUS TRUTHSOME.

LYON and Russell were determined to make their room respectable, and not only respectable, but really handsome. It was the beginning of the summer term (following the term in which the events recorded in the last chapter took place); and, as Russell said, "It's worth while making your room jolly for summer term; partly because it is a long term, partly because there are no fires to make a mess; and then there is 'Speecher' too; one always likes the place to look decent on 'Speecher,' you know."

Accordingly, the first few days were in great part spent in getting the room respectable. It is wonderful how little things mount up. One buys a few dozen brass nails and tin tacks, but soon finds that more are wanted ; the deficiency has to be supplied : about a score of fresh packets of these nails and tacks alone have to be bought before all is done. Then there is picture-cord and picture-nails, and baize and fringe, and perhaps a new mantel-board and a few new brackets to fill up odd spaces. So that, by the time Russell and Lyon had finished their decorations, they found that the money had flown wonderfully. Still, they had reason to be satisfied with the result. To begin with, at the end of last term they had made a petition to the Matron, that had resulted in their having an almost new carpet, and a respectable cloth for the middle table. Then Lyon had a small side-table, a legacy from some fellow who had left, and he had brought a table-cloth from home for it.

They were well off for pictures, Russell having half a dozen hunting scraps, neatly framed, a few photographs of scenery, several heads of dogs and horses, and three of those large prints of Landseer's best known paintings, which cover a great space, but are regular "art-murders."

Lyon had brought several very good oleographs from home, as well as some water-colour drawings done by his people. He also had four sporting pieces, and one or two good prints. Lyon did the picture hanging (with Russell's assistance when needed), while Russell undertook what he called the "tapestry and drapery department." He was determined not to confine himself to the unvarying monotony of red or green baize and fringe, so he went about the town to find something more out of the common. The shopkeepers, he thought, were very stupid. He asked to see baize of other colours than red or green. No, they had none. Well, he was not particular about its being baize; had they any cloth or other material? No, none. He explained it was for covering mantelpieces or bed-door panels. No, they had nothing that would do. At last he turned to leave the shop in despair. Just then, his eye lighted on something which looked like dark-blue baize. "Hullo! what's this?" he exclaimed. "That, sir, is blue flannel," replied the shopman, rubbing his hands together. "Well, why won't that do?" All the shopman could answer was, that it wasn't usual to cover mantel-boards with flannel, and that most gentlemen used baize. "Didn't I tell you that I wanted something unusual and different from what most gentlemen use?" cried Russell. So he purchased some blue flannel, and the shopman, with the air of one who is amusing a child or humouring an idiot, then produced some material of a rich violet hue, though he stated that he didn't think gentlemen had ever asked for it before. Russell was much taken with it, and bought some. He returned in triumph to the house. When all was finished it looked very well. The inside window sill, which was very unsightly, being cut and stained with ink, was covered with blue flannel with red fringe (he could not get blue); and the bed-door panels were covered with violet stuff fastened on with grand star-pattern brass nails. The mantel-board was covered, later on in the term, with a worked affair from home, but, for the first few weeks, it was done in violet with red fringe.

Then they got several brackets, and on them and the mantelpiece placed various ornaments, of which the most striking was a china figure of a gentleman in blue, sitting on the edge of a large gilded shell of fabulous shape. Next they purchased a fire-ornament—one of the “cascade” pattern ; but the very night it was put up, Russell thoughtlessly, from sheer habit, flung the match he had struck to light the gas with into the fender, and in a moment the fire-ornament was in a blaze, nearly setting the chimney on fire, and singeing the fringe of the mantelpiece. However, after three or four ornaments had perished in this manner, they were cured of the trick, and managed to keep one unhurt till the end of the term. Russell wrote home for muslin curtains, which were not, however, put up till a little before “ speaker,” lest they should get dirty before that eventful day. After all the decorations were completed, Russell and Lyon bound themselves to abide by the following regulations :—

(1.) That they should take it in turns to sweep the floor (maid’s sweeping goes for nothing), shake the table-cloths, and eradicate grease spots from the mantelpiece once a week.

(2.) That neither of them should leave his books, clothes, etc., about the room.

(3.) That they should, as much as possible, prevent other fellows from smashing their ornaments, or making a mess about the room.

But, faithfully as they kept to these agreements, accidents did occur. Fellows would come and play “ footer ” in the room during their absence, or borrow books from the shelves and pull down all the rest to get at the particular ones they wanted. So that a broken picture-glass or ornament, or an upset of ink on the table-cloth, were not rare occurrences. Then the maid would always arrange their furniture to her own taste, which was not identical with theirs. Nevertheless, on "Speaker" the room presented a truly gorgeous appearance. Besides their own ornaments they had borrowed several from fellows whose people were not coming down. Then the muslin curtains and worked mantel-cover were in their glory. Cleanliness and neatness reigned supreme. Pots of ferns stood in the fender in front of the fire-ornament. As "Speaker" was a blazing hot day, it was quite a treat to come into the room. By a judicious arrangement of opening the windows in the morning (when the sun was on the other side of the house), and with the help of blocks of ice in the washhand-basins, the temperature was delightful. As to flowers, the table appeared to be one mass of them; they had spent quite a fortune at Naylor's.

They were most artistically arranged in vases, tooth-glasses, and soap-dishes, and even in the cup belonging to a travelling flask, which had been pressed into the service. On each bouquet hovered gorgeous butterflies (tropical ones, secured by a little gum in natural positions on the flowers), while a refreshing little fountain occupied one of the presses. This was Lyon's idea; it was supplied from a jug on the top of the bookshelf above, by an indiarubber tube.

Their people were quite enchanted, and seemed to think that their hopeful sons did all their work amid this blaze of flowers and butterflies and fountains—in fact, in a sort of fairyland. If they had looked into the next room (which belonged to fellows whose people were not expected), a broken table, a three-legged chair lying on the ground, a smashed jug, a pool of ink, and an accumulation of jam-pots, would have met their eyes, and their ideas of life at Harrow would have been rudely dispelled.

CHAPTER XIII.

ANOTHER SUMMER TERM.

“ When Bill plays at cricket,
No ball on the green
Is shot from the wicket
So sharp and so clean ;
He stands at his station
As strong as a king,
When he lifts up a nation
On Victory’s wing.”

FROM “MUSA BURSCHICOZA.”

THAT Summer Term was peculiarly delightful to our hero. His last summer, it will be remembered, was spoilt by his sudden removal to the “Sanny.” But this year no such calamity marred his pleasure. At cricket he greatly distinguished himself, and, before long, got into “Sixth-form Game.” He had no chance of his “flannels” that year, but many looked on him as a future player at Lords. He was one of the house bowlers, bowling being his strong point.

The first house match was played on a whole holiday, and began after “eleven bill.” Great was the excitement. Belfield was still the captain of the Kingsfordites, and a very good captain he made. In the first innings he made 68, not out ; their total being 149. Then the other side went in, and came out for 150. In his second innings, Belfield was unlucky, and got run out for seven. Russell was the man who was expected to make up for this misfortune. The first ball he made a fine hit to leg, followed by another and another. The score was running up. The enemy put on other bowlers, but to no purpose. By the time five wickets were down he had made 52. Fellows came from all parts of the field to look on. The shouting was tremendous. Mr. Kingsford, himself a good player in younger days, paces excitedly up and down, ever and anon giving vent to his feelings by a shout of " Well hit, sir ! " Russell seems invincible. At last, playing perhaps a little carelessly, he sends the ball flying right up in the air. " Whew ! " exclaims Mr. Kingsford, stopping in his walk, as he follows the ball with his eyes, " out for certain ! " One of the " fields " runs forward and catches it—No ! he juggles with it for a moment and then drops it. Russell is still safe. A roar of derision and disappointment bursts from friend and foe respectively, at this incident. Then another steady spell of luck for our hero, and he carries his bat for 72, no mean contribution to the total score of 197.

It was too late to play out the match, but on the Monday evening after, play was resumed. Russell's bowling proved deadly. Five wickets fell to him, including the adversary's best man, cut off in his prime. Their total score was 98, leaving Kingsford's easily victors. Nor was Russell less distinguished in the next house match, which, however, they just lost.

Time passed wonderfully quickly, and soon came the little succession of events that proclaims the approach of "Speaker." First "Governors' Speaker," that time-honoured ceremony. What Harrovian recalls it not? The whole school assembled in "Speaker;" a sort of irregular bill called; the announcement from the head master that "it is our custom to receive the governors standing, and in perfect silence." Then the Head of the School, arrayed in evening dress, goes to summon the governors from the room where they are kept, and, after they have entered and are seated, he begins his Latin speech. It is a beautiful sight to see the faces of those among the governors and masters who care to follow the discourse in the book,—how their countenances light up at a joke or a happy allusion! Then to watch the Sixth form, who, for the most part, listen with a dignified grace, as if they took it all in as easily as English. Then, when the "Contio" is over, come the long-suppressed cheers, and the hand-shaking among the governors and masters. In a few days, after the rehearsals of the actual "Speeches" before the townspeople and the school, comes the great day itself. Russell was up early that day seeing to his room, the decorations of which have been described in the last chapter. His people came down pretty early, and were enchanted with the room. Then they were conducted by our hero to the various "lions" of the place. On the green, in front of the "Vaughan," played the Rifle Corps band, in uniform, with colours flying. After visiting the chapel, schools, terrace, "Vaughan," etc., it was time to go into "Speecher." When he had seen his people safely into seats, our hero came out and strolled about with a few others, sat in the chapel to hear the organ, and in various ways killed time. He met several old Harrovians, to some of whom he merely nodded; while with others he walked about, according to his acquaintance with them. There is Bowbury, who used to be in Kingsford's, he is at Cambridge now; and Brydges (by Jove! what a moustache he has grown!); and Pilton who looks like a man of thirty, though he only left last term; and there (the fellow with the white top hat and eye-glass) is "fop" Frankland; and there, yes, there! is "Cousin Charlie," in great force, with an alarming bouquet in his button-hole. How happy they all look! Nobody can say that old Harrovians lose their love for the old place. At last it is time to go and cheer the visitors up in the school-yard. (This was before new "Speecher" was completed.) Russell, with several others, strolls up and joins the throng of loungers sitting and standing under the temporary awnings against the big wall. At last the door of "Speecher" opens, and the company begins to pour out. The Head of the School takes up his position on the steps, supported by one or two masters, who nudge him when a "swell" appears. Then the fun begins. "Three cheers for Lord ——! Hip, hip, hip, hurrah!" cries the Head, and ere the shouting has died away, "Three cheers for the Bishop of ——." How pleased the good Bishop looks as he smiles round on the sea of young faces, and bows his thanks for the honour done him. Then more "swells" and more cheers; now for a brave officer, now for a solemn judge, now for a learned College Don, now for a noble lord. See that dear stout old gentleman with the benign spectacled face; how delighted he looks. How he bows, and smiles, and lifts his hat, little thinking that the cheers are not for him, but for the thin, nervous-looking celebrity, who has hurriedly passed down the steps scarce noticed, but whose name it is that has been the key-note of the shouting. More lords and ladies, more bishops and judges, more officers and travellers! The throng seems endless. The Head of the School is quite hoarse, and so is everybody. At last Russell sees his people, joins them, and they go back to the house. A short time is spent in the gorgeous room described in Chapter XII. and then comes the "spread" in hall. The room looks quite gay, with garlands, etc., and over the fireplace is a grand scroll with "Stet fortuna domus," the school motto, emblazoned on it. Mr. Kingsford is busy "doing the host," while the clatter of knives and forks and the hum of conversation is incessant. Why linger to detail the proceedings?

After the "spread" and a little more lionising, the Russells go off in their carriage (for they have driven down from London). When he has seen them off, our hero meets more old schoolfellows, and contrives to pass the time till the sun gets low and the visitors scarce, when he joins the throng of bathers at "Ducker," and enjoys a dip after the heat and glare and excitement of the day.

Summer term is a succession of excitements great and small, and as soon as "Speecher" is over, every one begins to think of Lords and Wimbledon.

Of these the first deserves a separate chapter ; to the last Russell, although a member of the Rifle Corps, was not going, having devoted his time to cricket, to the exclusion of the drills, etc., necessary before being put on the Wimbledon list. But although he was not going, he felt very patriotic on the morning of the day when he saw the 'busses, loaded with Rifle Corps fellows in uniform, start with colours flying and band playing ; and when they returned that night with the glorious news that the Ashburton shield was still to adorn the walls of the "Vaughan," he felt as proud as if he had been on the spot.

Quite at the end of the term, after Lords, came a spell of wet weather, such as even the oldest inhabitants never recollected to have occurred at that time of year. The cricket pitches were a swamp, the open racket and fives courts were inundated ; nothing could be done, except, indeed, in the gymnasium. Some one suggested "footer," and though the idea was novel, several "voluntary" games were well attended, and our hero was not slow to join them. Nor did a rush and a plunge in "Ducker," clothes and all, at the conclusion of the game, lessen its attractions ; and this proceeding, supplemented, as it always was, by a run up the hill and a hot bath, failed to produce the "death of cold" which the worthy matron predicted. One day Russell, finding swimming in foot-ball boots rather hard work, took them off before he went into the water ; but his stockings were so wet after the immersion, that putting on the boots when he came out was out of the question ; so he had to run home without, whereby his stockings and feet were not a little cut about.

The wet weather lasted till the end of the term, but fortunately did not extend over the holidays, which our hero spent travelling on the Continent.

CHAPTER XIV.

LORDS.

"Willow the King is a monarch grand,
Three in a row his courtiers stand;
Every day, when the sun shines bright,
The doors of his palace are painted white,
And all the company bow their backs
To the King, with his collar of cobbler's wax.
So ho! so ho! may the courtiers sing,
Honour and life to Willow the King!"

HARROW CRICKET SONG.

CROWD of fellows—the whole school, in fact—upon the green, under the swinging sign of the "King's Head," one bright summer morning. The stranger asking the meaning of this concourse will be told that every one has turned out to see the Eleven start for Lords, whither they drive in the coach that stands before the inn-door. At length they appear, in twos and threes, and mount to their seats, ready to start. Strong, gentlemanly young fellows all of them, in their sombre, plain clothes; you will hardly recognise them a few hours later, in their white flannels and dark-blue sashes, playing at Lords. Yet these humble-looking individuals are the heroes of the two days, not only among their schoolfellows, but before fashionable London (perhaps Royalty), before the cricketing world; their names will appear in every newspaper, thousands of eyes will be upon them, their every action will be the signal for a shout. (Courteous reader, if you are not an Harrovian, forgive the feeling which prompts this, perhaps, overdrawn description.) Off they go, and as the coach disappears down the London road, in a cloud of dust, a loud cheer rises from the crowd, heartily answered from the departing coach. Then every one goes back to breakfast; then comes an early second school, and then a rush for the station. Over this scene of confusion let us pass, and imagine ourselves at the gate of Lords.

A hansom drives up, and three youths alight. After the usual abuse from the cabman, they show their dark-blue tickets, and go on to the ground. Who is this in such elegant attire? No other than our hero; and his two companions are Lyon and Vernon, both equally spruce. Mark the white waistcoats and new trousers that have lately been the subject of grave discussion over Winkley's or Conways's counter; mark, too, the kid gloves and faultless top-hats; and last, but not least, the fashionable sticks, with their dark-blue tassels, selected, no doubt, after deep deliberation, from the extensive stock laid in by the enterprising "Gus."

"Come on; let's try and get a seat in front," exclaims Russell; and forthwith they make a rush for the ropes, where, after a short time, they get good places, and settle themselves to watch the play. Harrow is in, and some good hitting is taking place. "I wonder who the Eton wicket-keep is?"

says Vernon. "Oh, that's—let me see" (referring to his card)—"that's Godfrey," answers Russell. "No, it isn't," says Lyon; "Godfrey is that dark fellow at cover-point, because my brother knows his cousin, and——well hit, sir; well hit! By Jove! did you see that?" With such rambling conversation the time passed on till lunch-time arrived, when Russell and Vernon went off in search of food, and Lyon, more fortunate, got his in a carriage belonging to some friends on the ground. After the two others had satisfied their hunger and thirst, they found that play had been continued. The ground was now too crowded to give any chance of their getting a front seat, and they commenced a fruitless walk round, in search of any place where they could get a glimpse of the wicket. At last the innings is completed, and the crowd spreads out over the greensward. Everybody meets everybody else, then everybody strolls up to see the pitch being rolled, and soon the bell rings, and in a marvellously short time the ground is once more clear. Then again the bursts of applause and the click of the bat continue, till the sloping rays of the sun warn the spectators that the day's play is at an end.

Next day saw our hero driving with his people (who had places in the Grand Stand) to the scene of action. "Card o' the match, sir?" asks a card-seller of Russell. "Yes!" He looks at it anxiously, almost forgetting to pay for the card in his excitement. Eton are all out, and the dark blue have just gone in. Why detail our hero's doings that day? It was just yesterday over again, except a shower of rain, by way of variation, and the consequent rush for shelter. But it soon cleared up again, and Russell was once more threading his way among the carriages in search of some friends, when a hand was laid upon his shoulder, and, looking round, he saw "Cousin Charlie" standing by his side, resplendent in dark blue tie, and evidently much elated. "How d'ye do, young man!" he began; "saw you in the crowd yesterday, but couldn't catch your eye. All flourishing, eh? grand match, isn't it?" With such like exclamations, spoken in his loudest tones, "Charlie" went on, till an unfortunate engagement took him away leaving our hero to continue his peregrinations. Lots of old schoolfellows he met; old Harrovians "most do congregate" at the Eton r. Harrow at Lords.

Late in the afternoon the match is finished, leaving Harrow victors over a well-matched foe after a closely-contested game. Loud are the cheers, hearty the congratulations when all is over, and right proud is the dark blue of its hard-won triumph.

I am fully aware that my description of a match at Lords is feeble in the extreme; nevertheless, a book about Harrow, without mention of Harrow's greatest annual event, would be incomplete, and I must fall on the reader's forbearance, if my grovelling pen has in any way rendered tedious a subject which soars above my humble powers.

CHAPTER XV.

RUSSELL'S "FIND."

"Petruchio : What is this? mutton?"

1st Servant : Ay.

Pet. : Who brought it?"

1st Serv. : I.

Pet. : 'Tis burnt; and so is all the meat!"

SHAKESPEARE'S "Taming of the Shrew."

LET me explain to the uninitiated the meaning of the word at the head of this chapter. A "Find" in Harrow parlance signifies a party of two or more who club together to take their breakfast and tea in the room of one of their number, instead of going for those meals, as the lower boys do, into Hall. In some houses, the Sixth form only are allowed to be on a "Find," but in others (of which Kingsford's was one), the Fifth form are also eligible. And so it came about that when our hero reached the second Fifth form, he was put on a "find" consisting exclusively of Fifth-form fellows, who had to do their own fagging; and in the following term, having reached the first Fifth he was transferred to another which had a Sixth-form fellow on it, so that he, and the two other Fifth-form boys on the "find," though unable actually to practise fagging, had all the benefit of using Elsworthy's fags. At least so they maintained, though the fags didn't see it in the same light. One of the fags, Smith minor, was especially rebellious. "I am not your fag, but Elsworthy's," he would remark when Russell told him to go up town for hot meat. "No, you're not; you're the fag on No. 15 find," our hero would reply. But, in spite of these little disagreements, the members of the "find" got on very well with their fags, who were four in number, coming into office in order, for a week each.

Elsworthy was a merry sort of fellow, who didn't do much work, and had taken his time to reach the sixth form; the other members were Lyon, Vernon, and Russell. At the beginning of the term they framed a set of rules, which were hung up inside the "Find" cupboard, and of which the following is a copy.

RULES OF No. 15 FIND.

I. That every member of the "find" shall pay to the Treasurer, at the commencement of the term, a subscription of £1, to be expended in hot meat, jam, potted meat, rolls, etc., for the use of the "find."

II. That when this sum is all spent, there shall be a further voluntary subscription not exceeding 10s. per head, and the "find" shall take care to live more frugally for the rest of the term.

III. That any member wishing to introduce a visitor to a meal, shall give due notice beforehand.

IV. That any member misbehaving at table, or talking "shop" (except in "Trial" week) during meals shall be fined twopence, or rolls to that amount.

V. That any member bringing anything except a newspaper to read at table, shall be fined one penny.

VI. That the fags be kept in due order by the Sixth-form member, and that they be denied all "perquisites" except lump sugar in moderation.

VII. That any member making a mess on the table-cloth, or buttering the furniture, shall be fined threepence.

VIII. That all fines (if not paid in rolls) shall be handed over to the Treasurer.

IX. That if any member smashes any furniture or crockery, he shall pay for it when it appears in the "breakage list."

X. That members be expected occasionally (on whole holidays, etc.) to subscribe to a grand breakfast, to which visitors shall be invited.

XI. That any member who persistently sings, shouts, whistles, talks bosh, or otherwise renders himself offensive, shall be kicked down the passage, and excluded from the next meal on the "find."

XII. That the Treasurer every Saturday night take care to provide sufficient cold meat, etc., for Sunday.

We the Undersigned do agree to abide by these rules :—

G. F. ELSWORTHY (Sixth Form).

W. R. LYON (Treasurer).

H. RUSSELL.

D. A. VERNON.

These rules were most faithfully adhered to ; the seventh rule was always bringing our hero into trouble, but he paid up, each time he violated it, with a very good grace. Those meals on the "find," how luxurious they were ! Not as regards the food so much as the manner of taking it—the genial conversation—the discussion over the newspaper—the total exclusion of all the cares of work—the business-like concentration of all the energies on being comfortable. However cold the evening was, a roaring fire cheered the "find"-room, before which lay (according to the state of the funds) steaming dishes of savoury fish, flesh, and fowl, or the more frugal plate of hot-buttered toast and crumpets. However much trouble had fallen on any of the members during school—after one good grumble, all care was cast aside during the cheerful meal. The meat might be (but it was not often) tough, or the eggs antique ; but these trifles did not disturb the minds of the four philosophers bent upon jollity. "Give it to the fag," was the invariable formula spoken over any food unfit for human consumption.

Never was there a pleasanter party : Elsworthy the witty, Lyon the dense and good-natured, Russell the boisterous, and Vernon the musical. Their little differences in politics were sufficiently keen to create discussion without animosity ; in this too, they were pretty well divided, two a side, Elsworthy and Russell being Conservatives, and the other two Liberals. It was wonderful what a patriotic feeling they had for the old "find" room, with its red curtains and spacious "find"-cupboard ; it was Vernon's room, shared with a fellow in the Remove, who took breakfast and tea in hall, and was promptly ejected if he showed his nose in the "find"-room during meal time. It was rather hard lines on him being kept out of his room, especially in the evening, for they rarely sat over their tea for less than two hours, talking and laughing. However, to make up for it, he was often invited to take tea on Sunday, on the "find."

"Well," said Vernon, coming into the "find"-room for tea one miserable evening, putting his dripping umbrella in a corner, and proceeding to warm himself before the fire. "Well, this is enough to make a fellow vow that he'll never look at a 'con' again!" "Why, what's the row?" asked Elsworthy, who was making the tea. "Well, I did that 'con' right through (it isn't often I do), and knew every word of it, and now I've got to write it all out, Greek and English, and do fifty lines besides, all because I couldn't parse some beastly verb!" "Well," said Russell, "I'm very sorry for you, but it's time for tea now, not grumbling; so let's begin. There's cutlets and sausages to-night!" So with a good grace, Vernon cast his care away, and soon they were hard at work on the hot meat. "I say," says Elsworthy at last, "what do you say to giving a fags' feast?" "A fags' feast?" exclaimed Russell and Vernon in a breath. "Yes, a fags' feast; old Baker gave the fags on his 'find' a spread last term, and they worked all the better for it." "Oh, it'll make them fat and lazy, and they'll get so familiar and cocky too," said Lyon. "We must prevent that," replied Elsworthy; "no need of our talking to them much,—just let them feed well, that's all; and as to its making them lazy, I don't believe it." "But are we to sit and watch them feed?" asked Vernon. "Well, that depends; it would be rather infra dig to sit down with them to tea." "Oh, I don't know," said Russell; "we can keep dignified; and besides I don't see the fun of our going without tea just because we're too grand to sit down with them." "Perhaps you are right," replied Elsworthy, "but we must keep awfully dignified, or else they will get cocky, and think they need never do any fagging."

After a long discussion it was agreed that a fags' feast should be given, and Elsworthy, with his customary formality, drew up the following notice which he stuck up inside of the door of the "find"-cupboard, or, as he called it, the "notice board." As will be seen, admittance to the banquet was by no means unconditional, indeed, everything was ordered under most stringent regulations. The document ran as follows:—

"Whereas it has been decided to give the fags of No. 15 Find a fags' feast, the same will be given on Wednesday fortnight at tea-time. The following only are allowed to come,—Smith minor, Kinross, Dale, and Burlington junior. They must receive from Mr. Elsworthy certificates (duly signed by all the members of the 'find') of good conduct, activity, civility, etc., for the last three weeks. Without such a certificate none will be admitted. Any complaint on the part of the gentlemen of No. 15 will result in the exclusion of the fag complained of. N.B.—The fags must come to the feast, clean; and any fag misbehaving at table will be kicked out."

Wednesday fortnight saw the "gentlemen of No. 15" standing round the fire in the "find-room," "waiting," as Elsworthy remarked, "to receive the tenantry." Suddenly, the door was burst open, and in flew Kinross, hotly pursued by Burlington junior. "Hullo! I say," cried Russell, "just you go back, and come and knock at the door properly, or you shan't come to the spread at all." Accordingly, with much laughter, but with some show of submission, the irrepressible pair departed, and soon re-entered, accompanied by the other fags, in a most decorous fashion. The table had been lengthened by the addition of a small side table, rather higher than was comfortable, but still imposing. At this, Elsworthy presided, making tea, while Russell took the lower end, Lyon and Vernon (both with a fag at each elbow), occupying the sides. By this arrangement the fags were separated, having all of them a patron on each side. To make them feel still smaller, the fag-masters sat on elevated seats (i.e., chairs with big dictionaries to make them higher). The conversation was certainly constrained, for the members of the "find" were so dignified as to be ill at ease, while the fags—well, a hungry fag, with a good plateful of food before him, is no brilliant conversationist. The bill of fare was :

Tea.	Cocoa.
Fish Cutlets.
Rolls and Jam.
Roast Chicken.
Potted Tongue.	Honey.
Sardines.
Bread and Butter.

I have adhered to the order as nearly as possible. When the meal was over, and the fags were satisfied, the talk flowed a little more easily. The fags, having fed, had time to look about them; and Kinross, for the first time, observed the method by which the members' seats were constructed. "I say," he exclaimed, with a cheeky grin, addressing himself to Smith minor, who sat opposite; "these fellows have to have books stuck on their chairs, just like babes in the nursery!" "Hold your row!" replied Elsworthy, reddening, with a dignified frown. "Oh, I say, isn't he solemn?" cried the irreverent Burlington; "he looks as if he'd swallowed a poker!" "He's only 'stodged' with rolls, he'll be all right soon." This last remark, coming from Dale, a great fat fellow who was nearly "lag" of the school, caused a roar of laughter among the fags; for Dale's speeches were few and far between, and were not usually very brilliant. "If you fellows can't behave, you'll be kicked out," said Vernon severely, repressing a smile. "Oh, we don't mind," was the careless reply; "we've had our tea now, and we'll go as soon as you like." This was too true; they had got all they came for, viz., food; and now they were ready, if not impatient, to be off. All Elsworthy's precautions had been in vain, and the dignity of the "find" was suffering, nay, being held to open ridicule. What was to be done? Suddenly a bright thought struck Russell. "Look here," he said, scowling fiercely round the table, "this will be the last feast we give if you can't behave." "Well, you never meant to give another," remarked Dale, quietly; "at least not this term." This was quite true, and rather floored our hero for a moment, but he quickly replied, "Next term, though, we meant to give another, but we shan't now, unless you hold your insolent row." "Oh, as to next term," answered Burlington, unconcernedly, "Smith and I shall be out of fagging, and Kinross and Dale have promised to be fags on Fosser's 'find' next term, so we don't mind what arrangements you choose to make."

* * * * *

"No," said Russell, thoughtfully to Vernon, as he said good-night to him, a few hours later, "no ; I don't think we'll give another fags' feast."

CHAPTER XVI.

A "STOPPED EX."

"He is a wise man, who, even when Fortune is against him, seeks to make the best of adversity; who, when others would frown, ceaseth not to smile, and if he have naught better to laugh at, diverteth himself with the thought of how little his troubles afflict him."

SAYINGS OF SIR TITUS TRUTHSOME.

YES, Russell's "Ex" was stopped; and he was most indignant. But no arguments would alter Mr. Kingsford's determination. "If you choose to throw dirty water out of the window, when I happen to be passing underneath, you must expect to have your Exeat stopped," was all that our hero could get out of his tutor.

So finding appeal was useless, he went to his room, and wrote home as follows:—

"My dear Father,—

"I am very sorry that I shall not be able to come to you for the Exeat, as I have had a little misunderstanding with Mr. Kingsford; and as he seems to wish it, I have agreed to stay here for the Exeat, and I daresay that we shall soon be as good friends as ever. I am really sorry that Mr. Kingsford should have made this mistake, since he is usually very reasonable, as Masters go. The weather is fine here. I hope you are all quite well. Give my love to dear Mother, and the girls, and believe me,

Your affectionate son,

H. RUSSELL."

After posting this letter he felt quite relieved, and indeed rather looked forward to the novelty of an Exeat at Harrow, where he had never spent one before.

There were eight fellows in the house who were not going for the "Ex." Among them were Leigh, Burlington junior, and Dale, names not unfamiliar to us, and also O'Corke, a queer sort of chap, in the "Shell," who delighted in mechanics, engineering, etc. The only Sixth-form fellow left during the "Ex," was Grimes, a small and unimportant individual, who had come into the school only a year ago, and who, having got over every one's head so quickly, was looked upon by most fellows as a "conceited young ass;" it may therefore be imagined that his influence was not great.

When the last cab had disappeared down the street, on the Friday evening, Russell and Leigh turned from the window out of which they had been looking, and strolled into the Hall. There was no regular "lock-up" call that night, but Mr. K. looked in to see that every one was there. After an uncomfortable tea with Leigh and a Fifth-form fellow named Jacobson, our hero sauntered round the house in search of amusement. Most of the rooms were in darkness, but at last he saw a light gleaming from under a door, and immediately made for it. It was O'Corke's room, a comfortless single room without a fireplace, popularly known as "the Den."

Opening the door suddenly, Russell nearly knocked down O'Corke, who was bending over a small boiler at a table. "What have you got there?" demanded our hero, seating himself on the window-seat, and taking up a hammer that was lying near, with which he commenced to beat a vigorous tattoo on a Latin Dictionary also close at hand. "Boiler," replied the engineer laconically, without turning round. "How do you work it?" "I'll show you in a minute," he replied, lighting a candle and turning out the gas, after which he produced an india-rubber tube which he fitted on to the gas burner and lit at the end, placing the flame under the boiler.

Russell sat in silence for a few moments, awaiting the result. He had not long to wait. A loud explosion shook the room; he had a vision of spouting water and clouds of steam; he saw O'Corke spring a yard into the air, and then all was darkness. After sitting stupefied for a moment, Russell perceived an awful smell of escaping gas, and groped towards the burner to turn it off. This done, he bethought him of O'Corke. "I say, where are you? Are you hurt?" he inquired. No reply but a groan. "Can't you speak, and tell a fellow what's the row?" persisted Russell. "Only a bit scalded," replied a voice from under the table.

An hour later O'Corke was in bed, his face enveloped in cotton wool, and half-a-dozen fellows round him, offering mixed sympathy and ridicule. "I say, old chap, how did it happen?" inquired Leigh; "I wasn't here to see the fun, but I heard a row like a young volcano going off. Really, though, I hope you're not much damaged." "Oh, I don't mind about myself," replied the invalid, piteously, "it's only my nose and mouth that are hurt; but my beautiful new boiler is smashed all to bits, and I only got it yesterday from Birmingham. It was such a beauty!" "Why didn't you clap on the safety-valve?" inquired Russell. "Oh, you know nothing about boilers," said O'Corke. "Glad I don't, if they're all like this," answered our hero. "Well, good night, old fellow; hope you'll be all right to-morrow." So saying, he departed, accompanied by Leigh to his own room, where they spent the rest of the evening together over roasted chesnuts and biscuits.

It seemed queer to Russell going to bed alone in his room; every moment he expected Lyon would walk in, and he half envied that individual when he thought that he was at that moment probably enjoying himself at the play.

Next morning Russell "cut" nine-bill and took a "froust;" this he thought a good idea, as it cost him some "lines," the writing of which whiled away a considerable part of an idle whole holiday. He went down to a rather feeble game at football in the afternoon, and walked over to the "Sanny" after four-bill.

After "lock-up" and tea, our hero, with Leigh and Burlington junior, wandered about the house, at a loss what to do. Suddenly a bright thought struck Russell. "Let's have a concert!" The very thing! No sooner said than done. All the fellows in the house were got together, except Grimes (whose Sixth-form dignity disapproved of the whole proceeding) and the unfortunate O'Corke (whose injuries still kept him in bed).

The orchestra consisted of two combs, two drums (baths thumped with pokers), a pair of cymbals (two shovels clashed together), and a conductor. This last official was Leigh, with a racket as a "bâton," which he used occasionally rather forcibly on his unruly band. Every one, except the combs, sang, or rather shouted lustily. After a preliminary practice in Russell's room, they proceeded to march in procession about the passages, playing "Bonny Dundee," "The British Grenadiers," and other airs of a lively character. To perform this portion of the programme the drummers used coalscuttles instead of baths, on account of their being more portable.

During a pause, partly for breath, partly to settle what melody should next be given, a timid voice was heard: "Oh, you fellows, would you mind not making such a row, please!" A roar of laughter greeted this remonstrance on the part of Grimes, who had joined them unobserved; and some one defiantly striking up "For he's a jolly good fellow," and the air being speedily caught up by the rest with renewed vigour, the temporary head of the house disappeared, after a few efforts to make himself heard.

For a few moments the cavalcade proceeded on their way unmolested, but suddenly, at the end of a dark passage, there appeared a strange figure. Every one stopped their music, and gazed, spell-bound, at the advancing apparition. Clad from head to foot in white, its head (which seemed of enormous size) hidden from view in a mass of snowy drapery, and holding in one hand a flickering candle, the figure came towards them noiselessly. All at once the truth dawned upon Jacobson. "Why it's O'Corke!" he cried, and sure enough, bare-footed, in his night-shirt, a towel round his bandaged head, there stood the occupant of "the Den." Hearing the row, as well he might, he had crept from his bed, and come out to see what was the matter. Before they had time to explain, the piteous voice of Grimes was again heard, this time conveying a message from Mr. Kingsford, who, not being musical, objected to the concert. Drowning the unfortunate Head's expostulation by hoots, the band was just striking up "See the conquering hero comes!" when the "conquering hero" appeared round the corner in the shape of Mr. Kingsford, who dispersed the musicians with a warning, that if he heard any more of the concert he would issue invitations for "extra school" to all the performers.

So ended the first and last concert of the season, and the bandsmen, a little tired and hoarse, went off in various directions to refresh themselves with lemonade or cocoa in their rooms.

Russell was surprised on Sunday morning by being asked to sing in the chapel choir. All the choir, except two, were gone away for the Exeat, but the substitutes acquitted themselves very creditably.

In the afternoon, after a short scripture lesson, he started off with Leigh for a walk along the Kenton road. Finding two donkeys roaming at large by the roadside, what was more natural than to capture and mount them? The appearance of two fellows in swallow-tail coats and top hats riding on asses is somewhat strange, and so thought a crabbed old countryman who was coming along the road. Thinking that there was something wrong, he took upon himself to interfere. "Hi, there, yer young rascals," he shouted, "come out o' that, will yer? Get off them there jackasses, or I'll teach yer better." "Just you try it on, old buck!" retorted Leigh, giving his steed a touch up with his knotted handkerchief, which had no effect, for the animal only shook his ears and continued browsing. "Gee up, Neddy!" cried Leigh, redoubling his efforts. But before the animal could be made to stir, the old rustic was at his side. "Now then master, just yer get off that there donkey!" he exclaimed wrathfully. Just at this moment a clattering of hoofs was heard, and, looking round, Leigh saw the other donkey galloping down the road towards Harrow, Russell holding on like grim death. His own steed, startled by the noise, began to kick ferociously, upsetting the aged bucolic into the ditch, and then proceeded to rid himself of his rider. Glad to escape from the countryman, whom he left swearing in the ditch, and anxious to see Russell's fate, Leigh ran as hard as he could down the road, just in time to catch sight of Russell, still bestriding the donkey (which, however, had come to a standstill), confronted by three of the masters, who were out for a walk. They were too much amused to give any punishment, and after a few facetious remarks about two-legged and four-legged donkeys, went on their way, but not until Russell had dismounted.

The two riders never heard or saw anything more of the old rustic; but, as Leigh observed, "he was too lively when he was in the ditch to have been badly hurt."

So ended the events of the Exeat; and next day, when the two stood cool and comfortable before the house door, watching with pity the wretched Ex-goers returning, late, dusty, and heated, they were not so very sorry they had stopped at Harrow.

CHAPTER XVII.

SIXTH-FORM DIGNITY.

"The power of fagging belongs to both divisions of the Sixth Form, that is, to about the first eighty boys in the school. . . . Fagging, in its main features, is at the worst tiresome, hardly menial, and never cruel."

ARTICLE ON "HARROW" IN
"The New Quarterly Magazine," (No. 23).

THE stranger passing any of the large houses at Harrow must be wonderfully puzzled by the stentorian roars which from time to time are heard from within their walls. These roars—"calls" as they are termed—proceed from the lungs of the members of the Sixth form, and are addressed to the fags, who soon learn the voices of their masters, and come accordingly. It is hard to represent in writing the sound emitted by a Sixth-form fellow in the act of calling; it is the word "boy" indefinitely prolonged, the call terminating with the caller's supply of breath.

One fine morning our hero stood in the passage outside his door, his hands in his pockets, his head thrown back, his mouth wide open, his face crimson. He was giving his first call. His admiring friends stood around, chaffing him on his newly-gained dignity, for he had just got into the Sixth form. The fag came, with a smile on his face, and Russell ordered him with an air of great importance "just to light the fire," as if he had been accustomed to give the command every day for years.

Before many days his voice ceased to sound strange to the fags, his "call" grew more emphatic, less quavering, and his manner more imposing.

The great difficulty was to preserve that solemn air in all his actions which he thought befitted a Sixth-form fellow. He set himself to the task of taming his high spirits with a will. Some one picked up a memorandum which was said to be in his handwriting, running as follows:—

- | | |
|----------------------|--------------------------------|
| N.B. Must not | (1) Make a row in passages. |
| | (2) Loaf at the house door. |
| | (3) Be familiar with the fags. |
| Must | (1) Keep order in the house. |
| | (2) Snub the fags. |
| | (3) Look solemn always. |

But he did not, luckily for his popularity, keep all these rules very scrupulously, and though he made the fags do their work, and kept fair order, he could never "do the solemn," for—

"His dignity was like an inverted cone, Wanting its proper base to stand upon."

He was as merry as ever, and when there was more row than usual about the house, fellows always said, "Oh! it's only Russell trying to make some chaps shut up making a row."

Russell would never consent to do what too many Sixth-form fellows delight in, viz., do other people's work. He had quite enough to do with his own, and if any fag came up to him with a "Please Russell, will you just tell us this bit of 'con;'" I can't make it out," he usually left the room quicker than he came, and just as wise.

As befitted his position, our hero now had a single room, Lyon having left at the end of the previous term. Though the apartment was small, and not handsomely fitted up, it was very comfortable, containing two "frousters," of which one had but one arm, and the other none, but which looked nevertheless imposing. He also had one of the large "Liddell and Scott's Lexicons," which contributed in no small degree to our hero's dignity. Not that he ever opened it, but it looked learned; and it was a nice little job for an unruly fag to cut fifty pages of it with a large paper-knife which Russell kept for the purpose. On one occasion he gave a fag a historical book to cut, and afterwards discovered that the neatly folded maps with which the work was embellished had also been carefully cut at the fold right through the middle.

Let it not be supposed, however, that intellectual pursuits entirely engrossed our hero's time. It was Easter term, and he set himself to running with a will. Every morning half-cooked steaks found their way into his room and down his throat; every afternoon saw him "doing" the "Pinner mile," or going over the shorter course on the "Ducker road." Although he started "scratch" in all the house races, he came in first in the half-mile and second in the mile; and he was induced by his friends to enter for some school-races.

One dull afternoon after four-bill, accordingly, he might have been seen at the starting-post of the "mile," waiting for the sound of the pistol. It goes off; they start. Five of them there are, but two drop off before the half-mile is passed. Holdby, a fellow in the School Cricket Eleven, and Faber, the captain of the School Football, are our hero's opponents. Holdby leads by some yards, the two others keep close together. Suddenly, just as they turn the corner and come in sight of the crowd at the winning-post, Holdby gives in,—he has not calculated his strength, and is unable to finish. Faber and our hero spurt simultaneously. "Russell!" cry some of the bystanders; "Faber, well run Faber!" cry others, while not a few murmur "dead heat." And dead heat it will be if they go on like this; only ten yards more, but Russell, putting all his strength forward, breasts the tape, winner of "the School Mile" by about two yards only. What cheers, what congratulations, as our hero sits down to recover his wind. "Well run, old fellow," exclaim half a dozen familiar voices all round him. Mr. Kingsford comes up and offers to drive him home, but he is all right again, and refuses the offer with thanks; and before long is trotting back over the course, contentedly sucking a lemon, accompanied by his friends.

Nor was our hero less lucky in other races; and many a handsome cup adorned his room by the end of term.

One night our hero was sitting in his room after the gas was out, going over some "con," when he heard a tremendous row in the passage. His first impulse (for he was not yet quite accustomed to Sixth-form dignity) was to rush out and join in it; but a moment's reflection caused him to stalk solemnly out at his door, candle in hand, and say in a commanding tone; "I say you, fellows—get to your rooms, and shut up making this beastly row!" "Oh, please Russell, we're only having races; it's such fun." "Fun or no fun," said our hero, inwardly longing to join in the row, "just go to your rooms, or I'll make you!" Accordingly they dispersed, and Russell returned to his room.

But he had not been there many moments before the row began again, louder than ever.

His dignity greatly insulted, he strode out with a racket, and laid into the offenders liberally, effectually dispersing them.

He had not, however, been a quarter of an hour in his room, before a row of a different kind attracted his attention. "Bump, bump, bump;" something being dragged down stairs, something pretty heavy too. Suddenly a pause, followed by a succession of quicker thumps ending in a crash. Whoever it was had thought it less trouble to let his burden make its own way to the bottom. Russell rushed out into the darkness to see what was the matter, and instantly measured his length on the floor, shooting over some heavy obstacle. Getting up, minus some of the skin with which Nature had furnished his shins, he cried out angrily; "What's all this row about? Who's there? Get to your room, whoever you are—or rather come with me, and have a taste of my racket first." So saying, he retired with as much dignity as his bruised shins would allow of, and proceeded to get the instrument of torture from its place of honour on the wall. "Come on," he shouted, "whoever you are,"—but no one came to receive the punishment. Snatching up a candle, Russell went out—this time more carefully—to find the offender. He could see no one; on the floor lay the cause of his calamity, a large hamper containing the dirty boots of the fellows in the upper passage—or rather some of them, for the fall down stairs had partly emptied the hamper (which had no lid) of its contents; and there lay, in hideous confusion, big boots and little boots, muddy boots, comparatively clean boots, thick boots, thin boots, shoes, football boots, etc., ad libitum. After gazing a moment on this wreck of leather and mud, our hero again bethought him of discovering the culprit. Suddenly he saw a dirty face with a hideous leer, peeping round the corner of the passage, its nostrils dilated, its eyes twinkling with merriment, its lips compressed as if to contain a struggling shout of laughter. At first Russell could not imagine what the apparition was, but he was not left long in doubt. After a loud guffaw, accompanied by the wildest gesticulations, out came "Jeemes" the footman from his hiding-place round the corner. "Ho, ho, ho," he gasped; "lor! didn't I laaf jest, to see them blooming boots a' bowling down the stairs—I let 'em go so neat—and then to see Mister Russell a flyin' out for all the world like a cracker; ho! ho! ho! down he came, O my goodness, such a smasher! an' I heard him there a'swearin' softly to himself; and then back he goes to get his blooming racket, thinkin' as he'd whop some of the young gents ; and bye and bye he comes out with his candle that savage, and first he sees the boots, and then he ketches a sight of me—oh ! ho ! ho ! lor ! Mister Russell, yer'll be the dith of me, yer will ! ”

Our hero could not help being amused at the man, and seeing several inquiring heads surmounting nightshirts appearing at the various doors down the passage, he turned on his heel, muttering something about “careless fellow,” and once more entered his room, where he was soon nursing his wounded shins, preparatory to getting to bed.

This is but a sample of Russell's cares—hardly a day passed but his Sixth-form dignity was outraged and had to be avenged.

So true is the saying, “Uneasy lies the head that wears a crown.”

CHAPTER XVIII.

CONCLUSION.

"There are always many matches going on during 'cricket quarter,' but the choice of the eleven is seldom finally disposed of until within a few days of the match at Lords. By this means the emulation between those who are trying for a place in the 'roll of heroes' is kept up, and the disposition of the honour is always regulated by the performance of those upon whom it is conferred."

R. PITCAIRN'S "Harrow School."

WHY this unusual stir at "bill"? Everybody seems to have come up to the schoolyard very early, and those of the Sixth form who have been called over stand aside instead of passing out at the gates. The bill-master looks pleased; he goes on calling: "Smith Maximus?" "Here, sir." "Russell?" Our hero's answer is drowned in a storm of clapping—hundreds of pairs of hands greet him as he runs forward and lifts his hat (see, it is a speckled one*) in acknowledgment of the honour, and then disappears in the throng to receive renewed congratulations from his friends. Yes; Russell has "got his flannels" (that is, uninitiated reader, he has got into the School Cricket Eleven), and never did any one more thoroughly deserve the distinction. All the term his energy at cricket has been unflagging, and two nights before the "clapping up at bill" the captain "gave him his flannels." To tell the truth, his modesty somewhat dreaded the ceremony of being clapped; but now the ordeal is over, he looks radiant as he goes down the street with two or three companions, his new brass buttons shining in the sun.

* The School Eleven only are permitted to wear white flannel trousers, and their costume is completed by a dark-blue sash and tie, a straw hat speckled black and white, and a white flannel coat with brass buttons bearing the school device. The eleven cap is striped dark-blue and white.

It has been remarked that however obscure, retiring, or even unpopular a fellow may have been, as soon as he gets his flannels he becomes popular, and it is thought an honour to be among his friends. But Russell did not need honours to bring him friends, he was popular enough before; now, however, he feels of more importance, though his is a disposition which nothing can make conceited.

It was a happy summer term, his last term at Harrow, and the remembrance of it was a bright spot in his school memories after he had left. The matches in which he played, the runs he made, the old friends he met, the new friends he made among the strangers who came to play in different matches, all these things lent a charm enjoyable only by a member of the School Eleven.

Our hero's room at this closing period of his Harrow career was a sight. Its walls were covered with trophies of his skill in athletics of every sort. There hung his House Cricket Eleven cap, and his football belt and fez; there hung the dark-blue cap of the Philathletic Club, and the magenta and black coat and cap of the School Football Eleven; and, to crown all, there hung the dark-blue and white cap and the brass-buttoned coat. Besides these adornments might be seen the sword and cap which he wore as an officer in the Rifle Corps, while cups of all sizes and shapes betokened his prowess in running.

At Lords Russell made a very fair score, and Harrow was victorious, so his happiness suffered no check. Of course all the Eleven were clapped separately in the schoolyard a few days after the match.

The prospect of leaving was no pleasant one to our hero, and as the time approached he was quite melancholy. Not that his case was so bad as that of some other fellows in the Eleven, who would probably never have anything to speak of in the cricket way after they had left, for Russell was going to Oxford, where he might find a still wider field for his skill. But the thought of leaving the old place, of losing so many friends, some of whom he might never see again, and the prospect—yes, he could not deny that—the prospect of ceasing to be a schoolboy, all this filled him with a certain amount of sorrow.

But he finished off the term and his Harrow career in a very merry fashion, in which we may as well follow him.

It was the last Saturday of the term, a whole holiday, and a beautiful warm day. At a little after nine o'clock might have been seen, in the room over Winkley's, some twelve fellows, several of them in the Eleven, sitting down to a substantial repast. It was our hero's "leaving breakfast."

The bill of fare was varied, consisting of salmon, ducks, chickens, cutlets, curry, ham, beef, jam, tea, coffee, omelette, etc.; but even these delicacies did not entirely put a stop to conversation, which was plentiful, and chiefly turned on that most appropriate theme, the approaching departure of the breakfast-giver.

"You must come down and see us, old fellow, next term," said one. "Yes, that I will," replied our hero, helping his neighbour to chicken for the fourth time. "I must try and get a game of 'footer.' It's a rummy feeling, that I'll never play in a house match again." "Oh, Russell, don't go doing the melancholy," exclaimed another speaker; "you're a lucky dog to have done with school; I only wish I were leaving instead of coming back to two more terms of Latin and Greek."

"Oh, you may say that now," answered Russell; "but when the time comes, you'll wish you weren't leaving, and would put up with the Latin and Greek, if you could have another year of cricket and football with your old friends. Besides, one gets to be fond of the dear old place, and I think a fellow who is glad to leave must be either a brute or an ass." "I feel just the same," remarked he of the four helps of chicken; "I am awfully sorry to leave, though I wouldn't have believed it a year ago." "I'm rather sorry," continued Russell, in a more cheerful tone, "that I am leaving without a taste of the birch; it seems as if one's education was not complete without it." Here followed a series of jests about the birch, and our hero having been cheated of his deserts. By this time the capacity of the eaters had at length failed, and after unlimited iced lemonade, a move was made to the schoolyard, where "bill" was just beginning.

Let us pass over a few hours, and imagine ourselves in the old Speech-room. The concert is about to begin. Fellows are scrambling to their places; the gallery is filling with old Harrovians; the performers are busy making their final preparations. Seated with several other members of the Cricket Eleven up by the window that overlooks the road, we see our hero. The evening is sultry; the old casements, with their glowing coats of arms, are thrown open, and those who are sitting nearest lean out of them. Inside the room all is one hum of conversation, mingled with the impatient stamping of the audience. Suddenly a lull, followed by a burst of music, proclaims that the concert has commenced. How they echo through the walls, those young voices!—some childish in their clearness, others manly in their deeper and more vigorous tones. Perhaps nowhere as at Harrow is school singing carried so far. Every one joins, every one feels each word that he is singing, and the old school songs ring forth year after year with a freshness that awakes many a slumbering memory in the hearts of the listeners, whose schoolboy days are past.

Suddenly Russell (who has been making signs of recognition to Lyon, who is leaning over the red-baize parapet of the old Harrovians' gallery) finds that something is wanted of him. What is it? Nothing less than a solo. Yes, he, a popular member of the Eleven, must give them a verse of the Cricket Song. They will take no denial, and in a twinkling his friends have got him on his legs, and he is singing, with as much spirit as if he had never sung it before :

“ Crash the palaces, sad to see ;
Crash and tumble the courtiers three !
Each one lays, in his fear and dread,
Down on the grass his respected head ;
Each one kicks, as he downward goes,
Up in the air his respected toes ! ”

Then comes the chorus, loud and joyous, from hundreds of voices :

“ So ho ! so ho ! may the courtiers sing,
Honour and life to Willow the King ! ”

Then another fellow in the Eleven gives the next verse, and the captain sings the last, and the chorus again rings through the room, and floats out through the open windows into the warm summer air, startling, perchance, the passing stranger, who wonders what is the cause of the applause that follows the song.

More school songs, more applause, more solos, and then, right heartily given, comes “ Auld Lang Syne,” sung, with all the time-honoured ceremony, with hands crossed.

Finally comes, from loyal hearts and voices, “ God save the Queen ; ” and then the fellows pour down the school steps into the yard.

Just by the gates our hero meets Lyon, whom he has not seen till to-day since he left the school. “ Hullo, old chap ! how d’ye do ? ” he exclaims, grasping his hand ; “ what are you about now ? You promised to write often, and you’ve never given me a line since you left.” “ Oh, haven’t I ? ” replied Lyon, carelessly ; “ I’m very sorry, but I’ve been so awfully busy ; going in for Sandhurst soon ; I've been hard at work ever since I left. But tell us something about yourself, old fellow ; you're leaving this term, aren't you ?" " Yes, I'm sorry to say I am," answered Russell, taking Lyon's arm, and walking him off towards the house ; " I don't half like it now the time is come. However, it can't be helped.—Why, here is ' Jimmy ' Belfield, with a lot of old fellows !" Let us leave them in the midst of their handshaking, and pass over twenty-four hours or so.

Russell was walking along the street, arm in arm with Lyon, who had stayed over Sunday ; evening Chapel was just over,—the strains of the old familiar hymn, which is always sung at the end of service on the last Sunday of term, were still ringing in their ears, and Russell thought, as he had never thought before, of the beautiful words of the last verse. " All who here shall meet no more." The words seemed to haunt him. True, he would probably often revisit the old place, and see some of the old faces ; but it was not like coming back as a schoolboy. After a few years, his name would sound strange in the ears of a younger school-generation, and if he came down to see the familiar places, unknown faces would stare, and wonder who he was ; he would hail with pleasure the recognition of an old servant or tradesman, whom he barely knew by sight when he was at school.

Something of this, but not all, he said to Lyon, who attempted, and, in the end, successfully, to brighten our hero's dismal picture of the future. " Oh, nonsense ; you'll meet no end of old fellows up at Oxford, and you'll often be down here for cricket and football; and as to you're not being known in a year or two, it's all bosh; and even if it weren't, you wouldn't mind it then. There's no good looking so glum about it. You know, if you stayed on here much longer, all your friends would leave, and you wouldn't care much for the new set that sprang up; I shouldn't bother my head about it, if I were you."

With such arguments, Lyon enticed Russell from his gloomy frame of mind; and, soon after, falling in with several other fellows, the subject dropped, and was forgotten.

All next day Russell was packing up and running hither and thither. He had got two "copies," and was up at Crossley and Clarke's selecting them, when he remembered that it was time to go up and be called over. Then he went down to see the swimming competition at "Ducker," and then up the hill again, to settle bills and pack up books, and a thousand other small nuisances. So that when the evening came he was rather tired. In "Speecher" he got two prizes, one a "leaving" book. The Head Master made a complimentary little speech, in wishing him well, and the applause that followed showed unmistakeably our hero's undiminished popularity. Then came some of the first partings, viz., those with the Scotch and Irish fellows, who were off that evening, and left before Chapel.

After "lock-up" there was the usual big supper in hall. When the viands had been done justice to, toasts were proposed. That of "one of those who are leaving, our most popular Cricket Captain, and a member of both School Elevens," was soon given by Mr. Kingsford,—and Russell's response was awaited amid thunders of applause. Though perhaps neither original nor fluent, it was a fair sample of schoolboy oratory, and ran somewhat as follows:—

“Ladies and gentlemen (laughter)—I mean gentlemen (continued applause),—I am—(applause)—I am very much obliged to you (thunders of applause) for the very kind way in which you have drunk my health. (Hear, hear!) I am very sorry I'm leaving, but I hope that—(hear, hear) that I (applause, and sound of breaking wine-glasses, during which the speaker made a fresh start). I want to express my thanks to Mr. and Mrs. Kingsford for their kindness while I've been here (great applause). I hope the House Cricket Eleven will keep up its name next year, and that we shall be cock-house again. I am sure that the gentleman on my right (great applause) will prove a better captain than I have been (no, no, and applause; more broken glass). There are times, gentlemen, when,—(hear, hear, and laughter) when a fellow doesn't know what to say (laughter and cheers), so I'd better sit down, and give the toast of the future Captain of the Cricket Eleven, Mr. Parry (loud applause, and more glass broken), coupled with success (hear, hear) to the House Cricket.” (Loud and continued applause.) Here Russell sat down, overcome by the efforts of his oration, but was soon laughing and applauding the speech of “Mr.” Parry, who seemed at a loss what to say, and upset his glass of wine in his nervous efforts to make some sound—good, bad, or indifferent.

The speeches, it must be confessed, rather deteriorated as the evening wore on, for all that could be said had been said by former speakers; and at length one gentleman whose health had been drunk, had to confess openly that he had nothing to say except the inevitable "thanks—kind manner in which—drunk my health," a sentiment which was getting a trifle hackneyed. So he "called expressive silence to his aid," and everybody, finding that no more fun was to be got out of his neighbours, spontaneously and simultaneously wished the proceedings at an end; and, after a somewhat awkward pause, Mr. Kingsford rose, and the hall was soon empty.

Russell went to the drawing-room to pay his adieux to Mrs. Kingsford, after which he repaired to his room, and was before long asleep after the fatigues of the day.

There remains but little more to be told. Next morning, as the coach laden with the Harrow Eleven is lost to sight in a cloud of dust, on their way to finish up their season with a pleasant day's cricket at Moor Park, let us leave our hero, still a member of the School Eleven, but actually and indisputably an old Harrovian.

In laying aside his pen, the Author cannot but feel the feeble character of all he has written. But he will be amply repaid if some memory of old days, some half-forgotten custom, some well-known spot, has been, by these humble pages, brought to the minds of any of that numerous and distinguished body, in whose hands he would leave this little work.

THE OLD HARROVIANS

“ What though, in unceasing flow,
Generations come and go
O'er Harrow's hill?
New trees may bloom, old trees grow sere,
Old buildings moulder, new appear,
Yet Harrow, as year rolls on year,
Is Harrow still.”

From " The Tyro."

GLOSSARY

OF SOME OF THE PRINCIPAL WORDS AND USES OF WORDS PECULIAR TO HARROW.

N.B.—Orthography not guaranteed.

ALLOWS—Weekly pocket-money.

BILL—The calling over the whole school, about every two hours on holidays and half-holidays.

BILL-BOOK—A list of the school according to forms, published every term.

BLUE-BOOK—An alphabetical list of the school, published every term.

BOY—A fag. The word used in “calling” (vide Chap. xvii.).

CALL—A roaring or shouting of the word “boy.”
Verb. To call “boy.”

CAP—Phrase “To get one’s cap” = “To get into one’s House Cricket Eleven.”

COMPUL—Compulsory Football. (This takes place twice a week on half-holidays in winter term. The games are now arranged according to the merits of the players, irrespective of school order or houses.)

COCK-HOUSE—Champion-house (either at Cricket, Football, Rackets, Gymnasium, etc.).

CON—Noun Substantive. A construing lesson.

Verb. To construe.

Phrase. "To give a con" = To construe a passage for the benefit of one or more fellows, less wise or less diligent than the construer.

CONTIO—A Latin Oration read by the Head of the school annually before the Governors, and containing allusions to school events during the past year.

COPY—A book, awarded as a sort of minor prize, several of which entitle the holder to a prize proper.

COVERED—Noun Substantive. The covered racket-court.

CRICKET-FAGGING—Fielding out for any members of the Eleven or "Sixth-form Game" who are practising. All the lower school are in turn "put on."

DIV—A division. e.g., "French Div.," "German Div."

DUCKER—(Abbreviation of Duck Puddle.) The school bathing-place.

EX or EXEAT—Leave granted once a term from Friday evening to Monday morning.

EX-LETTER—A letter from home or friends to show where the recipient is to spend his "exeat."

EX-PAPER—A paper signed by all the masters with whom a boy has to do. Without this he cannot go for his "exeat."

EXTRA—Extra school, to which fellows are sent as a punishment. The masters in turn preside over it. The time is occupied in copying out Greek or Latin Grammar.

FEZ—(1) The tassel cap of a member of a House Football Eleven.

(2) A member of a House Football Eleven.

FIND—A company of two or more who take breakfast and tea together.

Verb. To mess together.

FLANNELS—Phrase "To get one's flannels" = "To get into the School Football or, (more usually) Cricket Eleven."

FOOTER—Football.

FOURTH-FORM } —Morning prayers at 7.30 in the PRAYERS } old Fourth-form Room, attended by certain Forms only, owing to want of space.

FROUST—Extra time in bed in the morning on Sundays, Saints-days, and whole holidays.

FROUSTER—An arm chair.

GYM—Gymnasium.

HOT MEAT—The addition to breakfast and tea purchased at a confectioner's. (In ordering hot meat, several colloquialisms are used—e.g., "Six of sausages with" = 6d. of sausages with potatoes.

"Two bob of cutlets without" = 2s. of cutlets without potatoes.)

HOUSE CAP } —The cap and shirt of the house HOUSE SHIRT } colours which any member of the house can and must wear at football, unless he is a "fez," when the "house cap" is discarded in favour of the more honourable "fez."

HOUSE SINGING—The meeting once a week, of one or more houses, for singing school songs, etc.

JAMBICS—Iambics.

LINES—A certain number of lines from a Latin or Greek author, to write out as a punishment.

LOCK-UP—The closing of the doors of all the houses in the evening, the time varying according to the season.

NOGGS—The school factotum.

NOTER—A note-book.

PAVVY—Pavilion.

PHILATHLET—(1) The Philathletic Club.

(2) The Philathletic Field.

PHUG—A heated state of the atmosphere.

PHUGGY—Stuffy, close.

PUN—A punishment, usually consisting in writing "lines," but sometimes the translation of a lesson.

PUN-PAPER—Ruled paper, every fifth line being red, used for writing punishments.

PUPP—Pupil Room (vide "Tutor").

REMOVE—(1) Certain Forms below the Fifth Form.

(2) Promotion into a higher form.

REP—A portion of an author to be learnt as a repetition.

SANNY—Sanatorium.

SCHOOL—Phrases (1) "A School" = a lesson, usually of one hour's duration.

(2) A master is said to "give his form a school," when he excuses them all a certain lesson, and does not require them to come up to school.

SCUM—Much the same as "smug."

SEND UP—A master sometimes sends a boy to the Head Master, usually for punishment, but sometimes "for good."

SICKER—Sick-room, to which fellows are sent when not ill enough to go to the "Sanny."

SIGNATURE—A master's signature, excusing a boy work, bill, etc.

SKEW—Noun substantive. A dunce.

Verb. To fail in a lesson.

SKY—Verb. To overthrow at football.

SLAVE-DRIVER—A boy whose duty is to see that the cricket fags go down when their turn comes.

SMUG—An appellation the reverse of complimentary, usually applied to an unpleasant or unpopular fellow.

SPEECHER—(1) The Speech-room.

(2) The assembly of the whole school in Speech-room.

(8) The day on which the annual School Recitations and Festivities take place. This is in Summer term, and must not be confused with Founders' day, later in the year.

SQUASH—(1) Rackets played with a soft india-rubber ball.

(2) A "scrimmage" at football.

STINKS—Under this euphonious term are included Chemistry, Natural Philosophy, Experimental Science, etc.

STRAW—A straw hat. These, made very shallow, are the week-day head-gear of the fellows at Harrow, in winter and summer alike.

SUPER—Verb. To superannuate.

SWOT—Noun substantive. One who devotes all his time to work.

Verb. To employ oneself with school work.

TAILS—The swallow-tail coat worn by the senior fellows in the school.

TEEK—Arithmetic.

TOLLY—A candle.

TOLLY-UP—Verb. To keep a candle alight at night, after lawful hours, usually to do work by.

TORPIDS—House matches at football, in which only those play who have not yet completed two years in the school.

TOSH—A footbath.

TRIALS—Terminal examinations.

TUTOR—(This system is said to be borrowed from Eton.) Except in certain cases the house-master is tutor to all in his house. But if he is not a classical master, the fellows in his house attend the "pupil rooms" of the junior masters.

TWIG—Verb. To detect. Past participle, Twug, detected.

UP—Phrase "To be up" = "To be in school."

(The) VAUGHAN—The school library, built to commemorate Dean Vaughan's head mastership.

